WORKS

OF

Samuel Johnson, LL.D

VOITIDT WILL Y

IN TRILLIF TOLUMES

HTI#

AN ESSAY ON HIS LIFE AND GLNIUS, BY ARTHUR MURPHY, Log

VOLUME THE LIEVLNIH

IOADO V

Printed by J. A. chols and S. n. Ped Lean P stage. Fl. et Street.

I. v. 1 N. ch. is & Son.; F. & C. Rivameton. Ottnder & Son.; A. Strahm;
I. v. 1 N. ch. is & Son.; F. & C. Rivameton. Ottnder & Son.; A. Strahm;
I. v. 1 N. ch. is & Strahm; F. & C. Ch. is & Strahm;
I. v. 1 N. ch. is & Strahm; F. & C. C. Ch. is & Strahm;
I. v. 1 N. ch. is & C. J. Stocked v.; J. Cutl. It. ch. ch. ch.
I. v. 1 N. ch. is & L. ch. is & L. ch. is & H. ch. ch. ch.
I. v. 1 N. ch. is & C. J. Stocked v.; J. Cutl. It. ch. ch. ch.
I. v. 1 N. ch. is & C. J. Stocked v.; J. Cutl. It. ch. ch. ch.
I. v. 1 N. ch. is & C. J. L. ch. ch. ch. ch.
I. v. 1 N. ch. is & L. ch. ch. ch. ch.
J. Book. v.; J. Cutponter; B. Craby. F. Jeff. v.; J. M. v.; W. Miller;
J. & A. Ard. Pluck. I. v. & K. med. v.; J. St. v.; J. Hand. v.; J. Manv. u.; J. Booth. J. A. perre; R. S. b. R. Bald unity. Faulder;
Sh. rw. d. N. e. j. & Jones; J. Johns v. & C.; and T. Underwood—
Dughton & Son. at Cambrid e.; and W. lon. & Son. at Nork.

(111)

CONTENTS

OF

THE ELEVENTH VOLUME

THE LIVES OF THE ENGLISH POETS

								inge
SIJIFT	-	-		•		-		1
BROOME	-					-		49
POPE -		-		-	-		-	J4
PITT		-		•				218
THOUSON -			•					221
WATTS		-					-	238
A. PHILIPS			-					249
WEST	-			_		-	-	2.9
COLLINS				-				265
DYER -	-					-		272
SHENSTONE			-					276
YOUNG								286
MALLET -	-			_		_		347
AKENSIDE,								3.5
GRAY,								364
LYLLELTON,		-					-	390

SWIFT

AN account of Dr Swift has been already collected, with great diligence and acuteness, by Dr Hawkesworth, according to a scheme which I had before him in the intimacy of our friendship I cannot therefore be expected to say much of a life, concerning which I had long since communicated my thoughts to a man expable of dignifying his narrations with so much elegance of language and force of sentiment

JONATHAN SWIFT was, recording to an account said to be written by himself*, the son of Jonatian Swift, an attorney, and was born at Dublin on St Andrews day, 1667 according to his own report, as delivered by Pope to Spenee, he was born at Leiecster, the son of a clergyman, who was minister of a parish in Herefordshire \ During his life the place of his birth was undetermined He was

† Spence's Anecdotes vol II p 273 Vol. XI B

con-

^{*} Mr Sheridan in his Life of Swift observes that this account was ie lly written by the Dean and now exists in his own hand writing in the library of Dublin College R contented to be called an Inshman by the Irish; but would occasionally call himself an Englishman. The question may, without much regret, be left in the obscurity in which he delighted to involve it

Whatever was his birth, his education was Irish. He was sent at the age of six to the school at Kilkenny, and in his fifteenth year (1682) was admitted into the University of Dublin

In his academical studies he was either not diligent or not happy. It must disappoint every reader's expectation, that, when at the usual time he claimed the Bacheloiship of Arts, he was found by the examiners too conspicuously deficient for regular admission, and obtained his degree at last by special favour; a term used in that university to denote want of ment

Of this disgrace it may be easily supposed that he was much ashamed, and shame had its proper effect in producing reformation. He resolved from that time to study eight hours a-day, and continued his industry for seven years, with what improvement is sufficiently known. This part of his story well deserves to be remembered, it may afford useful admonition and powerful encouragement to men whose abilities have been made for a time useless by their passions or pleasures, and who, having lost one part of life in idleness, are tempted to throw away the remainder in despan

In this course of daily application he continued three years longer at Dublin; and in this time, if the observation and memory of an old companion may be trusted, he drew the first sketch of his "Tale of a Tub"

When he was about one-and-twenty (1688), being by the death of Godwin Swift his uncle, who had supported lum, left without subsistence, he went to consult his mother, who then he ed at Leicester, about the future course of his life and by her direction solicited the advice and pationage of Sii William Temple, who had married one of Mrs Swift's relations, and whose father Sir John Temple, Master of the Rolls in Ireland, had lived in great fainthauty of friendship with Godwin Swift, by whom Jonathan had been to that time maintained

Temple received with sufficient kindness the ne phew of his fither's friend with whom he was when they conversed together, so much pleased, that he detained him two years in his house. Here he became known to King William, who sometimes visited Temple when he was disabled by the gout and, being attended by Swift in the garden, shewed him how to cut asparagus in the Dutch way

King Wilham's notions were all military and he expressed his kindness to Swift by offering to make him a captain of horse

When Temple removed to Moor park, he took and when he was consulted by the Swift with him Earl of Portland about the expedience of complying with a bill then depending for making parliaments thennial against which King William was strongly prejudiced, after having in vain tried to shew the Farl that the proposal involved nothing dangerous to royal power, he sent Swift for the same purpose to the King Swift, who probably was proud of his employment, and went with all the confidence of a young man, found his arguments, and his art of displaying them, made totally meffectual by the pre-R2 deter-

determination of the King; and used to mention this disappointment as his first antidote against vanity.

Before he left Ireland he contracted a disorder, as he thought, by eating too much fruit. The original of diseases is commonly obscure. Almost every boy eats as much fruit as he can get, without any great inconvenience. The disease of Swift was giddiness with deafness, which attacked him from time to time, began very early, pursued him through life, and at last sent him to the grave, deprived of reason.

Being much oppiessed at Moor-park by this grievous malady, he was advised to try his native air, and went to Ireland, but, finding no benefit, returned to Sir William, at whose house he continued his studies, and is known to have read, among other books, "Cyprian" and "Irenæus" He thought exercise of great necessity, and used to run half a mile up and down a hill every two hours.

It is easy to imagine that the mode in which his first degree was conferred, left him no great fondness for the University of Dubhn, and therefore he resolved to become a Master of Arts at Oxford. In the testimonial which he produced, the words of disgrace were omitted, and he took his Master's degree (July 5, 1692) with such reception and regard as fully contented him.

While he lived with Temple, he used to pay his mother at Leicester a yearly visit. He travelled on foot, unless some violence of weather drove him into a waggon, and at night he would go to a penny lodging, where he purchased clean sheets for sixpence. This practice Lord Orrery imputes to his innate love of grossness and vulgarity, some may ascribe it to his desire of surveying human life through all its varieties, and others, perhaps with equal probability to a passion which seems to have been deeply fixed in his heart, the love of a shifting

his

In time he begin to think that his attendance at Moor part deserved some other recompense than the pleasure, however mingled with improvement, of femples conversation—and grew so impatient, that (1694) he went away in discontent

Temple, conscious of leaving given reason for complaint, is said to have made limit Deputy Master of the Rolls in Ireland which, according to his kinsman's account, was an office which he knew him not able to discharge. Swift therefore resolved to enter into the Church, in which he had at first no higher hopes, than of the chaplainship to the Pactory at Lisbon, but being reconneceded to Lord Capel, he obtained the prebend of Kilroot in Connor, of about a hundred pounds a year

But the infirmities of Temple made a companion like Staff so necessary, that he invited him back, with a promise to procure luin English preferrient in eveluange for the prebend, which he desired him to resign. With this request Swift complied, having perhaps equally repented their separation, and they lived on together with mutual satisfiction—and, in the four years that passed between his return and Femple's death, it is probable that he wrote the "Tale of a Tub and the "Buttle of the Books."

Swift began early to think, or to hope, that he was a poet, and wrote Pindarick Odes to Lemple, to the King, and to the Athenran Society, all not of obscure.

obscure men *, who published a periodical pamphlet of answers to questions, sent, or supposed to be sent, by letters. I have been told that Dryden, having perused these verses, said, "Cousin Swift, you will "never be a poet;" and that this deminication was the motive of Swift's perpetual malevolence to Diyden

In 1699 Temple died, and left a legacy with his manuscripts to Swift, for whom he had obtained, from King William, a promise of the first prebend that should be vacant at Wesminster or Canterbury

That this promise night not be forgotten, Swift dedicated to the King the porthumous works with which he was intrusted, but neither the dedication, nor tenderness for the man whom he once had treated with confidence and fondness, revived in King William the remembrance of his promise Swift awhile attended the Court; but soon found his solicitations liopeless

He was then invited by the Earl of Berkeley to accompany him into Ireland, as his private secretary; but, after having done the business till their arrival at Dublin, he then found that one Bush had persuaded the Earl that a Clergyman was not a proper secretary, and had obtained the office for himself. In a man like Swift, such circumvention and inconstancy must have excited violent indignation.

But he had yet more to suffer Lord Berkeley had the disposal of the deanery of Derry, and Swift expected to obtain it, but by the secretary's influence, supposed to have been secured by a bribe, it was bestowed on somebody else, and Swift was dismissed

^{*} The Publisher of this Collection was John Dunton R

with the livings of Laricor and Rathbeggin in the diocese of Meath, which together did not equal half the value of the deanery

At Laracor he increased the perceival duty by reading prayers on Wednesdays and Indiays, and performed all the offices of his profession with great decency and exactness

Soon after his settlement at Laracor, he invited to Ireland the unfortunate Stella, a young woman whose name was Johnson; the daughter of the steward of Sir William Temple, who in consideration of her father's virtues, left her a thousand pounds. With hier came Mrs. Dingley, whose whole fortune was twenty seven pounds a year for her life. With these Ladies he passed his hours of relivation, and to them he opened his bosom. but they never resided in the same house, nor did he see either without a witness. They lived at the Parsonage, when Swift was away and, when he returned, removed to a lodging, or to the house of a neighbouring clergy man.

Swift was not one of those minds which aimze the world with early pregnancy—lus first work, except his few poetical Essays, was the "Dissentions in "Athens and Rome, published (1701) in his thirty-fourth year. After its appearance, paying a visit to some bishop, he heard mention made of the new pamphlet that Burnet had written, replete with political knowledge. When he seemed to doubt Burnet's right to the work, he was told by the Bishop, that he was "a young man" and, still persisting to doubt, that he was "a very positive young man"

Three years afterwards (1704) was published "The Tale of a Tub of this book chanty may be persuaded to think that it might be written by a man of a peculiar character without ill intention; but it is certainly of dangerous example. That Swift was its author, though it be universally believed, was never owned by himself, nor very well proved by any evidence; but no other claimant can be produced, and he did not deny it when Archbishop Sharpe and the Dutchess of Somerset, by shewing it to the Queen, debarred him from a bishoprick.

When this wild work first raised the attention of the public, Sacheverell, meeting Smalridge, tried to flatter him, by seeming to think him the author; but Smalridge answered with indignation, "Not all that "you and I have in the world, nor all that ever we "shall have, should hire me to write the 'Tale of a "Tub"

The digressions relating to Wotton and Bentley must be confessed to discover want of knowledge or want of integrity, he did not understand the two controversies, or he willingly misrepresented them But Wit can stand its ground against Truth only a little while. The honours due to Learning have been justly distributed by the decision of posterity

"The Battle of the Books" is so like the "Conbat des Livres," which the same question concerning the Ancients and Moderns had produced in France, that the improbability of such a coincidence of thoughts without communication is not, in my opinion, balanced by the anonymous protestation prefixed, in which all knowledge of the French book is peremptorily disowned *

^{*} See Shendan's Lafe, edit. 1784, p 525, where are some remarks on this passage R.

" other

For some time after Swift was probably employed in solitary study, gaining the qualifications requisite for future eminence. How often he visited England, and with what diligence he attended his parishes, I I now not. It was not till about four years afterwards that he became a professed author, and then one year (1708) produced. The Sentiments of a "Church of-England Man, the ridicule of Astrology under the name of "Bickerstoff the "Argu" ment, against abolishing Christianity, and the defence of the "Sacramental Test"

"The Sentiments of a Church of England Man" is written with great coolness, moderation, ease, and perspicuity. The "Argument against abolishing "Christianity is a very happy and judicious from One passage in it deserves to be selected.

" If Christianity were once abolished, how could "the free thinkers, the strong reasoners, and the " men of profound learning, be able to find another " subject so calculated, in all points, whereon to "display their abilities 'What wonderful produc " tions of wit should we be deprived of from those, "whose genius, by continual practice, hath been " wholly turned upon raillery and invectives against " religion, and would therefore never the able to " slune for distinguish themselves, upon any other " subject! We are daily complaining of the great " decline of wit among us, and would take away "the greatest, perhaps the only, topick we have " left Who would ever have suspected Asgill for "a wit, or Toland for a philosopher, if the mex-" haustible stock of Christianity had not been at "hand to provide them with mat rials? What "other subject, through all art or nature, could have produced Tindal for a profound author, or furnished him with readers." It is the wise choice of the subject that alone adoins and distinguishes the writer. For had an hundred such pens as these been employed on the side of religion, they would have immediately sunk into silence and oblivion."

The reasonableness of a Test is not hard to be proved, but perhaps it must be allowed that the proper test has not been chosen.

The attention paid to the papers, published under the name of "Bickerstaff," induced Steele, when he projected the "Tatler," to assume an appellation which had already gained possession of the reader's notice.

In the year following he wrote a "Project for the "Advancement of Religion,' addressed to Lady Berkeley; by whose kindness it is not unlikely that he was advanced to his benefices. To this project, which is formed with great purity of intention, and displayed with sprightliness and elegance, it can only be objected, that, like many projects, it is, if not generally impracticable, yet evidently hopeless, as it supposes more zeal, concord, and perseverance, than a view of manking gives reason for expecting

He wrote likewise this year a "Vindication of "Bickerstaff," and an explanation of an "Ancient "Prophecy," part written after the facts, and the rest never completed, but well planned to excite amazement

Soon after began the busy and important part of Swift's life. He was employed (1710) by the primate

mate of Ireland to solicit the Queen for a remission of the First I routs and Twentieth Parts to the Irish With this purpose he had recourse to Mr Hirley, to whom he was mentioned as I man neglected and oppres ed by the la t ministry, because he had refused to co operate with some of their schemes What he had refused has never been told what he had suffered was, I suppose, the exclusion from a bishopriel by the remonstrances of Sharpe, whom he describes as "the harmless tool of others hate." and whom he represents as afterwards " sinning for " pardon

Harley's designs and situation were such as made him glad of an auxiliary so well qualified for his scrsice he therefore soon admitted him to funiharity. whether ever to confidence some have made a doubt but it would have been difficult to exert his zeal without persuading him that he was trusted, and not very casy to delude him by false persuasions

He was certainly admitted to those meetings in which the first hints and original plin of action are supposed to have been formed and was one of the sixteen Ministers, or agents of the Ministry, who met weekly at each other a houses, and were united by the name of " Brother

Bein_ not immediately considered as an obdurate Tory, he conver-ed indiscriminately with all the wits, and was yet the friend of Steele who, in the " Tatler, which begin in April, 1709, confesses the advantage of his conversation, and mentions something contributed by him to his paper. But he was now immerging into political controversy for the year 1710 produced the "Ixmuner, of which Suit

Swift wrote thirty-three papers. In argument he may be allowed to have the advantage, for where a wide system of conduct, and the whole of a public character, is laid open to enquiry, the accuser having the choice of facts, must be very unskilful if he does not prevail; but, with regard to wit, I am afraid none of Swift's papers will be found equal to those by which Addison opposed him.

He wrote in the year 1711 a "Letter to the Octo"ber Club," a number of Tory Gentlemen sent from the country to parliament, who formed themselves into a club, to the number of about a hundred, and met to animate the zeal and raise the expectations of each other. They thought, with great reason, that the Ministers were losing opportunities, that sufficient use was not made of the ardour of the nation; they called loudly for more changes, and stronger efforts, and demanded the punishment of part, and the dismission of the rest, of those whom they considered as public robbers.

Their eageiness was not gratified by the Queen, or by Harley. The Queen was probably slow because she was afraid, and Harley was slow because he was doubtful: he was a Tory only by necessity, or for convenience, and, when he had power in his hands, had no settled purpose for which he should employ it, forced to gratify to a certain degree the Tories who supported him, but unwilling to make his reconcilement to the Whigs utterly desperate, he corresponded at once with the two expectants of the

^{*} Mr Sheridan however says, that Addison's last Whig Examiner was published Oct 12, 1711, and Swift's first Examiner, on the 10th of the following November R

Crown, and kept, as has been observed, the succession undetermined. Not I nowing what to do, he did nothing and, with the fite of a double dealer, at last he lost his power, but kept his enemies

Swift seems to have concurred in opinion with the "October Club" but it was not in his power to quicken the tardiness of Harky, whom he stimulated as much as he could, but with little effect. He that knows not whither to go, is in no hister to move Harley, who was perhaps not quick by nature, became yet more slow by irresolution, and was content to hear that dilatorniess lamented as natural, which he applauded in himself as politick

Without the Tones, however, nothing could be done and, as they were not to be gratified, they must be appeased, and the conduct of the Minister, if it could not be vindicated, was to be plausibly excessed.

Early in the next year he published a "Proposal" for correcting improving, and ascertaining the 'English Fongue, in a Letter to the Earl of Oxford written without much knowledge of the general nature of language, and without any necurate enquiry into the history of other tongues. The certainty and stability which, contrary to all experience, be thinks attainable, he proposes to secure by instituting an reademy the decrees of which every man would have been willing, and many would have been proud, to disobey, and which, being renewed by successive elections, would in a short time have differed from it eff

Swift now attained the zenith of his political importance he published (1712) the "Conduct of "the Allies," ten days before the Parliament assembled The purpose was to persuade the nation to a peace; and never had any writer more success. The people, who had been amused with bonfires and triumphal processions, and looked with idolatry on the General and his friends, who, as they thought, had made England the arbitress of nations, were confounded between shame and rage, when they found that "mines had been exhausted, and millions destroyed," to secure the Dutch or aggrandize the Emperor, without any advantage to ourselves, that we had been bribing our neighbours to fight their own quarrel, and that amongst our enemies we might number our allies

That is now no longer doubted, of which the nation was then first informed, that the war was unnecessarily protracted to fill the pockets of Marlborough; and that it would have been continued without end, if he could have continued his annual plunder. But Swift, I suppose, did not yet know what he has since written, that a commission was drawn which would have appointed him General for life, had it not become ineffectual by the resolution of Lord Cowper, who refused to seal

"Whatever is received," says the schools, " is "received in proportion to the recipient". The power of a political treatise depends much upon the disposition of the people, the nation was then combustible, and a spark set it on fire. It is boasted, that between November and January eleven thousand were sold, a great number at that time, when we were not yet a nation of readers. To its propagation certainly no agency of power or influence was want-

winting It furnished arguments for conversation, specelies for debate, and materials for parliamentary resolutions

Yet, surely, whoever surveys this wonder working pamphlet with cool perusal, will confess that its efficiency was supplied by the presions of its renders that it operates by the mere weight of facts, with very little assistance from the hand that produced them.

This year (1712) he published his "Reflections" on the Barrier Treats, which earnes on the design of his "Conduct of the Alhes, and shows how little regard in that negotiation had been shown to the interest of England, and how much of the conquered country had been demanded by the Datch

This was followed by "Remarks on the Bishop of "Sarum's Introduction to his third Volume of the "History of the Reformation a primplilet which Burnet published as an alarm, to write the unition of the approach of Popery Swift, who seems to have dishled the Bishop with something more than political aversion, treats him his e one whom he is glad of an opportunity to insult

Swift, being now the declared favourite and supposed confident of the Tory Ministry, was treated by all that depended on the Court with the respect which dependents I now how to pay. He soon began to feel part of the misery of greatness. he that could say that he knew hina, considered himself as having fortune in his power. Commissions, solicit itions, remonstrances crowded about him he was expected to do every man's business, to procure employment for one, and to retain it for another. In assisting those who addressed him, he represents himself as sufficiently diligent; and desires to have others believe, what he probably believed himself, that by his interposition many Whigs of ment, and among them Addison and Congreve, were continued in their places. But every man of known influence has so many petitions which he cannot grant, that he must necessarily offend more than he gratifies, because the preference given to one affords all the rest reason for complaint. "When I give away a place," said Lewis XIV. "I make an hundred discontented, and "one ungrateful."

Much has been said of the equality and independence which he preserved in his conversation with the Ministers, of the frankness of his remonstrances, and the familiarity of his friendship. In accounts of this kind a few single incidents are set against the general tenour of behaviour. No man, however, can pay a more servile tubute to the Great, than by suffering his liberty in their presence to aggrandize lum in his own esteem Between different ranks of the community there is necessarily some distance; he who is called by his superior to pass the interval, may properly accept the invitation; but petulance and obtiusion are tarely produced by magnanimity; not have often any noblet cause than the pilde of importance, and the malice of inferiority. He who knows himself necessary may set, while that necessity lasts, a high value upon himself, as, in a lower condition, a servant emmently skilful may be saucy; but he is saucy only because he is servile. Swift appears to have preserved the kindness of the great when they wanted him no longer, and therefore it must

'anust be allowed, that the childish freedom, to which he seems enough inclined, was overpowered by his better qualities' ""

His disinterestedness has been likes is ementioned a strain of heroism, which would have been in his condition romantick and superfluous. I celesiastical benefices, when they become vicant, must be given away, and the filends of power may, if there be no inherent disquidification, reasonably expect them. Swift accepted (1713) the demery of St. Patriel, the best preferment that his friends could venture to give film. That Ministry was in a great degree supported by the Clergy, who were not vet reconciled to the liability of the "Tale of a Fub, and would not without much discontent and indignation have borne to tee hid/inistabled in an English Cathedral."

If He fefused, indeed, fifty pounds from Lord Oxford, "but the incepted afterwards in drought of a thou and apon the I whether, which was intercepted by the Onten's death, and which he resigned, as he says himself "milita gemens, with many a groun says himself "milita genens, with many a groun "I In the finder of his power and his politicles, he kept a political of his visits, his wilks, his interviews with Ministers, and quarrels with his servant, and transmitted it to Mrs. Johnson and Mrs. Dingley, to whom he knew that whatever befel him was interesting, and not necounts could be too minute. Whether these duirnal trifles were properly exposed to eyes which had never received any plea ure from the presence of the Dean, may be reasonably doubted they have, however, some odd attraction the reader, finding frequent mention of names which he has been used to consider as important, goes on in hope of information; and, as there is nothing to fatigue attention, if he is disappointed he can hardly complain. It is easy to perceive, from every page, that though ambition pressed Swift into a life of bustle, the wish for a life of case was always returning.

Vol XI C frequent

^{*} This emphatic word his not escaped the watchful eye of Dr Warton who has placed a nota bene at it C

He went to take possession of his deanery as soon as he had obtained it, but he was not suffered to stay in Ireland more than a fortnight before he was recalled to England, that he might reconcile Lord Oxford and Lord Bolingbroke, who began to look on one another with malevolence, which every day increased, and which Bolingbroke appeared to retain in his last years.

Swift contrived an interview, from which they both departed discontented; he procured a second, which only convinced him that the feud was irreconcileable; he told them his opinion, that all was lost.' This denunciation was contradicted by Oxford; but Bolingbroke whispered that he was right.

Before this violent dissension had shattered the Minstry, Swift had published, in the beginning of the year (1714), "The publick Spirit of the Whigs," in answer to "The Crisis," a pamphlet for which Steele was expelled from the House of Commons. Swift was now so far alienated from Steele, as to think him, no longer entitled to decency, and therefore treats him sometimes with contempt, and sometimes with abhorience.

In this pamphlet the Scotch were mentioned in terms so provoking to that mutable nation, that, resolving "not to be offended with impunity," the Scotch

Scotch Lords in a body demanded an audience of the Queen, and solicited reparation. A proclamation was issued, in which three hundred pounds were officed for the discovery of the author. I rom this storm he was, as he relates, "secured by a sleight of what kind, or by whose prudence, is not known; and such was the increase of his reputation, that the Scottish." Nation applied again that he would be "their friend."

But, by the distance of this great friends, this importance and designs were now at animal, and seeing his services at last meless, herefred about Jime (1714) into Berkshire, where, in the house of a friend, he wrote what was then suppressed, but has since appeared under the title of "I see I houghts on the present State of Maris", the sign of the present state of Maris " the sign of the present state of Maris", the sign of the present state of Maris " the sign of the present state of Maris".

While he was waiting in this retirement for events which time or chance might bring to pass, the death of the Queen brolle down at once the whole system of Lory Politicles and nothing remained but to withdraw from the implicability of triumphant Whiggism, and helter lumself in innerviced observity

The accounts of his reception in Ircland, given by Lord Orrery and Dr. Delans, are so different, that the credit of the writers, both undoubtedly veracious, cannot be saved, but by supposing, what I think is true, that they speak of different times. When Delany says, that he was received with respect, he means for the first fortnight, when he came to tale legal possession, and when Lord Orrery tells that he was pelted by the populace, he is to be understood of the time when, after the Queen's death, he became a settled resident.

The Aichbishop of Dublin gave him at first some distuibance in the exercise of his jurisdiction, but it was soon discovered, that between prudence and integrity he was seldom in the wrong; and that, when he was right, his spirit did not easily yield to opposition

Having so lately quitted the tumults of a party, and the intigues of a court, they still kept his thoughts in agitation, as the sea fluctuates a while when the storm has ceased He therefore filled his hours 'with some historical attempts, relating to the "Change of the Ministers," and "the Conduct of the Ministry" He likewise is said to have written a "History of the Four last Years of Queen Anne," which he began in her life-time, and afterwards laboured with great attention, but never published It was after his death in the hands of Lord Orrery and Dr King. A book under that title was published, with Swift's name, by Dr Lucas, of which I can only say, that it seemed by no means to correspond with the notions that I had formed of it, from a conversation which I once heard between the Earl of Orrery and old Mr. Lewis.

Swift now, much against his will, commenced Inshman for life, and was to contrive how he might be best accommodated in a country where he considered himself as in a state of exile. It seems that his first recourse was to piety. The thoughts of death rushed upon him, at this time, with such incessant amportunity, that they took possession of his mind, when he first waked, for many years together

He opened his house by a publick table two days a week, and found his entertainments gradually frequented by more and more visitants of learning among the men, and of elegance among the women Mrs. Johnson had left the country, and hived in lodgings not far from the deanery. On his publick days she regulated the table, but appeared at it as a mere guest, like other ladies.

On other days he often dined, at a stated price, with Mr. Worral, a clergyman of his cathedril, whose house was recommended by the premium neatness and pleasantry of his wife. To this frigal mode of hing, he was first disposed by care to pray some debts which he had contracted, and he continued it for the pleasure of accumulating money. His name, however, was not suffered to obstruct the claims of his dignity. he was served in plate, and used to say that he was the poorest gentlem in Ireland, that are inponiplate, and the richest that hived without a coach.

How he spent the rest of his time, and how he cm ployed his hours of study, has been enquired with hopeless curiosity. I or who can give an account of another's studies? Swift was not likely to admit my to his privacies, or to impart a minute account of his business or his lesure.

Soon after (1716) in his forty ninth year, he was privately married to Mrs Johnson, by Dr Ashe, Bishop of Clogher, as Dr Madden told me, in the garden The marriage made no change in their mode of life, they lived in different houses, as before; nor did she ever lodge in the deanery but when Swift was seized with a fit of giddiness "It would "be difficult," says Loid Orreiy, "to prove that "they were ever afterwards together without a third "person."

The dean of St Patrick's lived in a private manner, known and regarded only by his friends, till, about the year 1720, he, by a pamphlet, recommended to the Irish the use, and consequently the improvement of their manufacture. For a man to use the productions of his own labour is surely a natural right, and to like best what he makes himself is a natural passion. But to excite this passion, and enforce this right, appeared so criminal to those who had an interest in the English trade, that the printer was imprisoned, and, as Hawkesworth justly observes, the attention of the publick being by this outrageous resentment turned upon the proposal, the author was by consequence made popular.

In 1723 died Mrs Van Homrigh, a woman made unhappy by her admiration of wit, and ignominiously distinguished by the name of Vanessa, whose conduct has been already sufficiently discussed, and whose history is too well known to be minutely repeated. She was a young woman fond of literature, whom Decanus, the Dean, called Cadenus by transposition of the letters, took pleasure in directing and instructing, till, from being proud of his praise, she grew fond of his person. Swift was then about forty-seven, at an age when vanity is strongly excited by the amorous attention of a young woman. If it be said that Swift should have checked a passion which he never meant to gratify, recourse must be had to that extenuation which he so much despised, "men "are but men 'perhaps, however, he did not at first know his own mind, and, as he represents him self, was undetermined. For his admission of her courtship, and his indulgence of her hopes after his marringe to Stella, no other honest plea can be found than that he delayed a disagreeable discovery from time to time, dreading the immediate burst of distress, and watching for a favourable moment. She thought herself neglected, and died of disappointment having ordered by her will the poem to be published, in which Cadenus had proclaimed her excellence, and confessed his love. The effect of the publication upon the Dean and Stella is thus related by Delany.

that

"I have good reason to behave that they both "were greatly shoeked and distressed (though it may be differently) upon this occasion. The Dean "made a tour to the South of Ireland, for about two months, at this time, to dissipate his thoughts, "and give place to obloquy. And Stella retired "(upon the earnest invitation of the owner) to the "house of a cheerful, generous, good natured friend of the Dean's, whom she always much loved and "honoured There my informer often saw her and, if I have reason to believe, used his utmost endeavours "to reheve, support, and amuse her, in this sad "situation".

"One little incident he told me of on that occasion "I think I shall never forget. As her friend was an hospitable, open hearted man, well beloved, and largely acquainted, it happened one day that some for gentlemen dropt in to dinner, who were straight to

"to Stella's situation; and as the poem of Cadenus and Vanessa was then the general topick of conversation, one of them said, 'Surely that Vanessa must be an extraordinary woman, that could inspire the Dean to write so finely upon her' Mrs. "Johnson smiled, and answered, 'that she thought that point not quite so clear, for it was well known the Dean could write finely upon a broom-"stick'."

The great acquisition of esteem and influence was made by the "Diapici's Letters" in 1724. One Wood of Wolverhampton, in Staffordshire, a man enterprising and rapacious, had, as is said, by a present to the Duchess of Munster, obtained a patent, empowering him to coin one hundred and eighty thousand pounds of halfpence and faithings for the kingdom of Ireland, in which there was a very inconvenient and embarrassing scarcity of copper coin, so that it was possible to run in debt upon the credit of a piece of money, for the cook or keeper of an alehouse could not refuse to supply a man that had silver in his hand, and the buyer would not leave his money without change

The project was therefore plausible. The scarcity, which was already great, Wood took care to make greater, by agents who gathered up the old halfpence; and was about to turn his brass into gold, by pouring the treasures of his new mint upon Ireland, when Swift, finding that the metal was debased to an enormous degree, wrote Letters, under the name of M. B. Drapier, to shew the folly of receiving, and the mischief that must ensue by giving, gold

gold and silver for eoin worth perhaps not a third part of its nominal value

The nation was alarmed the new coin was universally refused but the governors of Ireland considered resistance to the King's patent as highly eriminal and one Whitshed, then Chief Justice, who had tried the printer of the former pumphlet, and sent out the Jury nine times, till by elamour and menaces they were frighted into a special verticet, now presented the Drapter, but could not prevail on the Grand Jury to find the bill

Lord Carteret and the Prny Council published a proclamation, offering three hundred nounds for discovering the author of the Lourth Letter had concealed himself from his printers, and trusted only his butter, who transcribed the paper. The man, immediately after the appearance of the proelamation, strolled from the house, and stad out all night, and part of the next day. There was reason enough to fear that he had betrayed his most r for the reward, but he came home, and the Dan ordered him to put off his livery, and leave the house "for, says he, "I know that my life is in your "power, and I will not bear, out of fear, either "your insolence or negligence The man excused his fult with great submission, and begged that he might be confined in the house while it was in his power to endanger his master but the Dean resolutely turned him out, without taking farther notice of him, till the term of the information had expired. and then received him again. Soon afterwards he ordered him and the rest of his servants into his pre sence, without telling his intentions, and bade them take Robert the butler, but that his integrity had made him Mr Blakeney, verger of St Patrick's, an officer whose income was between thirty and forty pounds a year: yet he still continued for some years to serve his old master as his butler*.

Swift was known from this time by the appellation of The Dean. He was honoured by the populace as the champion, patron, and instructor of Ireland, and gained such power as, considered both in its extent and duration, searcely any man has ever enjoyed without greater wealth or higher station

He was from this important year the oracle of the traders, and the idol of the rabble, and by consequence was feared and courted by all to whom the kindness of the traders or the populace was nece sary. The Drapier was a sign; the Drapier was a health; and which way soever the eye or the car was turned, some tokens were found of the nation's gratitude to the Drapier.

The benefit was indeed great, he had rescued Ireland from a very oppressive and predatory invasion; and the popularity which he had gained he was diligent to keep, by appearing forward and zealous on every occasion where the publick interest was supposed to be involved. Nor did he much scruple to boast his influence; for when, upon some attempts to regulate the coin, Archbishop Boulter, then one of the Justices, accused him of exasperating the people,

^{*}An account somewhat different from this is given by Mr Sheridan in his Life of Swift, p 511 R

he exculpated humself by saying, "If I had lifted "up my finger, they would have torn you to 'pieces

But the pleasure of popularity was soon interrupted by domestick misery. Mrs. Johnson, whose conversation was to him the great softener of the ills of life, began in the year of the Drapiers triumph to decline and two years afterwards was so wasted with sickness, that her recovery was considered as hopedless.

Swift was then in England, and had been invited by Lord Bolingbroke to pass the winter with him in France but this call of calmits hastened him to Ireland, where perhaps his presence contributed to restore her to imperfect and tottering health

He was now so much at ease, that (1727) he returned to England where he collected three volumes of Miscellanies in conjunction with Pope, who prefixed a querulous and applogetical Preface

This important year sent likewise into the world "Gulliver's Travels a production so new and strange, that it filled the reader with a mingled emotion of merriment and amizement. It was received with such avidity, that the price of the first edition was rused before the second could be made at was read by the high and the low the learned and il literate. Criticism was for a while lost in wonder, no rules of judgment were applied to a bool written in open definince of truth and regularity. But when distinctions came to be made, the part which gave the least pleasure was that which describes the Flying

Flying Island, and that which gave most disgust must be the history of the Houyhnhims.

While Swift was enjoying the reputation of his new work, the news of the King's death airved, and he kissed the hands of the new King and Queen three days after their accession.

By the Queen, when she was Princess, he had been treated with some distinction, and was well received by her in her exaltation; but whether she gave hopes which she never took care to satisfy, or he formed expectations which she never meant to raise, the event was, that he always afterwards thought on her with malevolence, and particularly charged her with breaking her promise of some medals which she engaged to send him

I know not whether she had not, in her turn, some reason for complaint A Letter was sent her, not so much entreating, as requiring her patronage of Mrs Barber, an ingenious Irishwoman, who was then begging subscriptions for her Poems. To this Letter was subscribed the name of Swift, and it has all the appearances of his diction and sentiments; but it was not written in his hand, and had some little improprieties. When he was charged with this letter, he laid hold of the inaccuracies, and urged the improbability of the accusation, but never denied it, he shuffles between cowardice and veracity, and talks big when he says nothing *.

He seems desnous enough of recommencing courtier, and endeavoured to gain the kindness of Mis

^{*} It is but justice to the Dean's memory, to refer to Mi Sheridan's defence of him from this charge See the Life of Swift, p 458 R.

Howard, remembering what Mrs Masham had performed in former times—but his flatteries were, lil e those of other wits, insuccessful—the Lady either wanted power, or had no ambition of poetical immortality

He was seized not long afterwards by a fit of giddiness, and again heard of the sickness and danger of Mrs Johnson. He then left the house of Pope, as it seems, with very little ecremony, finding "that two sick friends cannot live together and did not write to him till he found himself at Cliester.

He turned to a home of sorrow poor Stella was sinking into the grave, and, after a languishing decay of about two months, died in her forty-fourth very on landing 28, 1728 "How much he wished her life, his papers show nor can it be doubted that he dreaded the death of her whom he loved most, aggravated by the consciousness that himself had hastened it

Beauty and the power of pleasing, the greatest external advantages that woman can de irb or po sess, were fatal to the unfortunate Stella. The man whom she had the misfortune to love was, as Delany observes, fond of singularity, and desirous to make a mode of happiness for himself, different from the general course of things and order of Providence. From the time of her arrival in Ireland he cenid resolved to keep her in his power, and therefore him dered a match sufficiently advantageous, by accumulating unreasonable demands, and prescribing conditions that could not be performed. While she was at her own disposal he did not consider his possession.

session as secure, resentment, ambition, or caprice, might separate them; he was therefore resolved to make "assurance double sure," and to appropriate her by a private marriage, to which he had annexed the expectation of all the pleasures of perfect friendship, without the uneasiness of conjugal restraint. But with this state poor Stella was not satisfied, she never was treated as a wife; and to the world she had the appearance of a misticss She lived sullenly on, in hope that in time he would own and receive her; but the time did not come till the change of his manners and deprivation of his mind made her tell him, when he offered to acknowledge her, that "it was "too-late." She then gave up herself to sorrowful resentment, and died under the tyranny of him, by whom she was in the highest degree loved and honomed. Teller 2

What were her claims to this eccentrick tenderness, by which the laws of nature were violated to retain her, curiosity will enquire, but how shall it be gratified? Swift was a lover; his testimony may be suspected. Delany and the Irish saw with Swift's eyes, and therefore add little confirmation. That she was virtuous, beautiful, and elegant, in a very high degree, such admiration from such a lover makes it very probable abut she had not much literature, for she could not spell her own language, and of her wit, so loudly wainted, the smart sayings which Swift himself has collected afford no splendid specimen.

The reader of Swift's "Letter to a Lady on her "Marriage," may be allowed to doubt whether his opinion of female excellence ought implicitly to be admitted, for, if his general thoughts on women were such as he exhibits, a very little sense in a Lady avould encapture, and a very little virtue would astonish him. Stell as supremacy, therefore, was perhaps only local. she was great, because her associates were little.

In, some Remarks lately published on the Life of Swift, his inarriage is mentioned as fabulous, or doubtful but, alas' poor Stella, as Dr Madden told me, related hermelancholy story to Dr Sheridan, when he attended her, as a clergy man to prepare her for, death and Delany mentions it not with doubt, but only with regret in Swift never mentioned her without a sigh, if the jest of his life, was spent in Iteland, an a country to a linch not even power almost despotic, nor flatter a almo t idolatrous, gould reconcile him He sometimes wished, to visit England, but alway a found some gresson of delay, in He jells Pope, in the decline of life, that he liopes once more to see him "but if not a says he, "we must part as all human "but if not a says he, "we must part as all human "beings have parted"

"we must part as all human the beings have parted" in the beings have parted and the beings have parted and the beings have parted and the severity exisperated and the drove his acquaintance from his table, and you dered why he was deserted. But he continued his attention to the public, and prote from time to time such the public, and prote from time to time such the public, and prote from time to time such the public, and prote from time to time such the public, and prote from time to time such the public, and prote from time to time such the public, and prote from the public and proper, and nothing fell from his pen. In your universal contempt. Bettesworth, enraged at his disgrace and loss, went to Swift, and demanded whether he was the author of that poem? "Mr. "Bettesworth," answered he, "I was in my youth "acquainted with great lawyers, who, knowing my "disposition to sature, advised me, that if any scoun-"diel or blockhead whom I had lampooned should "ask," Are you the author of this paper? I should "tell him that I was not the author, and therefore "I tell you, Mr Bettesworth, that I am not the author of these lines"

Bettesworth was so little satisfied with this account, that he publickly professed his resolution of a violent and corporal revenge, but the inhabitants of St. Patrick's district embodied themselves in the Dean's defence. Bettesworth declared in Parliament, that Swift had deprived him of twelve hundred pounds a year.

Swift was popular a while by another mode of beneficence. He set aside some hundreds to be lent in small strings to the poor, hom five shillings, I think, to five pounds. He took no interest, and only required that, at repayment, a small fee should be given to the accomptant. but he required that the day of promised payment should be exactly kept. A severe and punctihous temper is ill qualified for transactions with the poor. the day was often broken, and the loan was not repaid. This might have been easily for escentibut for this Swift had made no provision of patience or pity. He ordered his debtors to be sued. A severe creditor has no popular character, what then was likely to be said of him who employs the catchpoll under the appearance of charity? The claimour against him was loud, and the resentment of the populace outregeous he was therefore forced to drop his scheme, and own the folly of expecting punctuality from the poor*

was

Hisasperity continually increasing condemned hint to solitude and his resentment of solitude sharpened his asperity. He was not, however, totally deserted some men of learning, and some women of elegance, often visited him and he wrote from time to time either verse or prose of his verses he willingly give copies, and is supposed to have felt no discontent when he saw them printed His favourite maxim was, " Vive in bigutelle he thought trifles a necessary part of life, and perhaps found them necessary to himself. It seems impossible to him to be idle, and his disorders made it difficult or dangerous to be long seriously studious, or laboriously diligent The love of ease is always trining upon age, and he had one temptation to petty amusements peculiar to himself, whatever he did, he was sure to hear anplauded 'and such was his predominance over all that approached, that all their applauses were probably sincere. He that is much flattered soon learns to flatter himself we are commonly taught our duty by fear or shame, and how can they act upon the man who hears nothing but his own praises?

As his years increased, his fits of giddiness and deafness grew more frequent, and his deafness made

Vol XI D con-

^{*}This account 1 contradicted by Mr Sheridan who with great warmth as erts from hi own knowledge that there was not one syllable of truth in this whole account from the beginning to the end See Life of Swift edit 1791 p 53° R conversation difficult; they grew likewise more severe, till in 1736, as he was writing a poem called "The Legion Club," he was seized with a fit so painful and so long continued, that he never after thought it proper to attempt any work of thought or labour.

He was always careful of his money, and was therefore no liberal entertainer, but was less frugal of his wine than of his meat. When his friends of either sex came to him, in expectation of a dinner, his custom was to give every one a shilling, that they might please themselves with their provision. At last his availed grew too powerful for his kindness; he would refuse a bottle of wine, and in Ireland no man visits where he cannot drink.

Having thus excluded conversation, and desisted from study, he had neither business nor amusement; for, having by some addiculous resolution, or mad vow, determined never to wear spectacles, he could make little use of books in his later years: his ideas therefore, being neither renovated by discourse, nor increased by reading, wore gradually away, and left his mind vacant to the vexations of the hour, till at last his anger was heightened into madness.

He however permitted one book to be published, which had been the production of former years; "Polite Conversation," which appeared in 1738. The "Directions for Servants" was printed soon after his death. These two performances shew a mind incessantly attentive, and, when it was not employed upon great things, busy with minute occurrences. It is apparent that he must have had the liabit of noting whatever he observed for such a number of particulars could never have been assembled by the power of recollection.

upon

He grew more violent, and his mental powers declined till (1741) it was found necessary that legal guardians should be appointed of his person and fortune. He now lost distinction. His madness was compounded of rage and fatuity. The last face that he knew was that of Mrs. Whiteway, and her he cersed to know in a little time. His meat was brought him cut into mouthfuls, but he would never touch it while the servant staid, and it list, after it had stood perhaps an hour, would eat it walking for he continued his old habit, and was on his feet ten hours a day.

Next year (1742) he had an inflammation in his left eye, which swelled it to the size of in egg, with boils in other parts—he was kept long waking with the pain, and was not easily restrained by five attendants from tearing out his eye

The tumour at last subsided and a short interval of reason ensuing, in which he knew his physician and his family, give hopes of his recovery but in a few days he sunk into a lethargick stupidity, motionless, heedless, and speechless. But it is said, that, after a year of total silence, when his house keeper on the 30th of November, told him that the usual bontires and illuminations were preparing to celebrate his birth day, he answered, "It is all folly, they had better let it alone

It is remembered, that he afterwards spoke now and then, or gave some intimation of a meaning; but at last sunk into perfect silence, which continued till about the end of October, 1744, when, in his seventy-eighth year, he expired without a struggle.

WHEN Swift is considered as an author, it is just to estimate his powers by their effects. In the reign of Queen Anne he turned the stream of popularity against the Whigs, and must be confessed to have dictated for a time the political opinions of the English nation. In the sneeeeding reign he delivered Ireland from plunder and oppression and shewed that wit, confederated with truth, had such force as authority was unable to resist. He said truly of himself, that Ireland "was his debtor. It was from the time when he first began to patronize the Irish, that they may date their riches and prosperity. He taught them first to know their own interest, their weight, and their strength, and give them spirit to assert that equality with their fellow subjects to which they have ever since been in iking vicorous advances, and to clum those rights which they have at last established Nor can they be charged with ingratitude to their benefictor for they reverenced him as a guardian, and obeyed him as a dietator

In his works he has given very different specimens both of sentiments and expression. His "Tak " of a Tub has little resemblance to his other pieces. It exhibits a vehenicuse and rapidity of mind, a copionalies of images, and vivaoity of diction, such as he afterwards never possessed, or never exerted. It is of a mode so distinct and peculiar, that it must be considered by itself, what is true of that, is not true of any thing else which he has written.

In his other works is found in equilible tenour of easy language, which rather trickles than flows His delight was in simplicity. That he has in his works no metaphor, as has been said, is not true, but his few metaphors seem to be received rather by necessity than choice. He studied purity, and though perhaps all his strictures are not exact, yet it is not often that solecisms can be found, and whoever depends on his authority may generally conclude himself safe. His sentences are never too much dilated or contracted, and it will not be easy to find any embarrassment in the complication of his clauses, any inconsequence in his connections, or abiliptness in his transitions.

His style was well suited to his thoughts, which are never subtilised by nice disquisitions, decorated by spaikling concerts, elevated by ambitious sentences, or variegated by far-sought learning. He pays no court to the passions, he excites neither surprise nor admiration, he always understands himself, and his reader always understands him, the peruser of Swift wants little previous knowledge, it will be sufficient that he is acquainted with common words and common things, he is neither required to mount elevations, nor to explore profundities, his passage is always on a level, along solid ground, without asperities, without obstruction

This easy and safe conveyance of meaning it was Swift's desire to attain, and for having attained he deserves praise. For purposes merely didactick, when something is to be told that was not known before, it is the best mode, but against that mattention by which known truths are suffered to he neglected, it makes no provision, it instructs, but does not persuade

By his political education he was associated with the Whigs but he deserted them when they deserted their principles, yet without running into the contrary extreme he continued throughout his life to retain the disposition which he assigns to the "Church of-England Man, of thinking commonly with the Whigs of the State, and with the Tories of the Church

He was a churchman rationally zealous he desired the prosperty, and maintained the honour, of the Clergy of the Dissenters he did not wish to in fringe the toleration, but he opposed their encroachments

To his duty as Dean he was very attentive. He managed the revenues of his church, with exact occonomy and it is said by Delany, that more money was, under his direction, laid out in repairs, than had ever been in the same time since its first erection. Of his choir he was eminently careful and, though he neither loved nor understood musick, took care that all the singers were well qualified, admitting none without the testimony of skilful judges.

In his church he restored the practice of weekly communion, and distributed the sacramental elements in the most solemn and devout manner with his own hand. He came to church every morning, preached commonly in his turn, and attended the evening anthem, that it might not be negligently performed.

He read the service, "rather with a strong, nervous "voice, than in a graceful manner his voice was "sharp and high toned, rather than harmonious

He entered upon the clerical state with hope to excel in preaching, but compluined, that, from the time of his political controversies, "he could only "preach pamphlets". This censure of himself, if judgment be made from those sermons which have been printed, was unleasonably severe.

The suspicions of his mieligion proceeded in a great measure from his dread of hypocrisy, instead of wishing to seem better, he delighted in seeming worse than he was. He went in London to early prayers, lest he should be seen at church, he read prayers to his servants every morning with such dexterous secrecy, that Dr Delany was six months in his house before he knew it. He was not only careful to hide the good which he did, but willingly incurred the suspicion of evil which he did not. He forgot what himself had formerly asserted, that hypocrisy is less inischievous than open impicty. Dr. Delany, with all his zeal for his honour, has justly condemned this part of his character.

The person of Swift had not many reommendations. He had a kind of muddy complexion, which, though he washed himself with oriental scrupulosity, did not look clear. He had a countenance som and severe, which he seldom softened by any appearance of garety. He stubbornly resisted any tendency to laughter

To his domesticks he was naturally rough, and a man of a rigorous temper, with that vigilance of minute attention which his works discover, must have been a master that few could bear. That he was disposed to do his servants good, on important occasions, is no great mitigation, benefaction can be but rare, and tyrannick previously is perpetual. He did not spare the servants of others. Once, when

when he dined alone with the Earl of Orrery, he said of one that waited in the room, "That man "has, since we sat to the table committed fitteen "faults What the faults were, Lord Orrery, from whom I heard the story, had not been attentive enough to discover My number may perhaps not be exact."

In his occonomy he practised a peculiar and offensive parsimony, without disguise or apology The practice of saving being once necessary, became liabitual and grew first ridiculous, and at last detestable But his avarice, though it might exclude pleasure, was never suffered to encroach upon his viitue was frugal by inclination, but liberal by principle and if the purpose to which he destined his little accumulations be remembered with his distribution of occasional charity, it will perhaps appear, that he only liked one mode of expense better than another. and saved increly that he might have something to He did not grow rich by injuring his successors but left both Laracor and the Deancry more valuable than he found them -With all this talk of his covetousness and generosity, it should be remembered, that he was never rich The revenue of his Deancry was not much more than seven hundred a year

His beneficence was not graced with tenderness or civility he relieved without pity and assisted without kindness so that those who were fed by him could hardly love hum

He made a rule to himself to give but one piece at a time and therefore always stored his pocket with coins of different value,

Whatever he did, he seemed willing to do in a manner peculiar to himself, without sufficiently considering, that singularity, as it implies a contempt of the general practice, is a kind of defiance which justly provokes the hostility of ridicule; he, therefore, who indulges peculiar habits, is worse than others, if he be not better.

Of his humour, a story told by Pope* may afford a specimen.

"Dr. Swift has an odd, blunt way, that is "mistaken by strangers for ill-nature Tis so odd, "that there's no describing it but by facts I'll tell "you one that first comes into my head. One even"ing, Gay and I went to see him. you know how "intimately we were all acquainted. On our coming "in, 'Heyday, gentlemen, (says the Doctor) what's "the meaning of this visit? How came you to "leave the great Lords that you are so fond of, to come lather to see a poor Dean" 'Because we "would rather see you than any of them.' 'Ay, "any one that did not know so well as I do night "believe you. But since you are come, I must get some supper for you, I suppose' 'No, Doctor, we have supped already.' 'Supped already' that's "impossible! why, 'tis not eight o'clock yet. That's "very strange; but if you had not supped, I must "have got something for you. Let me see, what "should I have had? A couple of lobsters; ay, "that would have done very well; two shillings "tarts, a shilling but you will drink a glass of "wine with me, though you supped so much before "your usual time only to spare my pocket?" - No, "we had rather talk with you than drink with you "—"But if you had supped with me is as in all reason you ought to have done, you must then have "drank with me —A bottle of wine, two shillings "—two and two is four, and one is five just two "and six pence a piece. There, Pope, there's half "a crown for you, and there's another for you, Sir "for I won't sive any thing by you, I am determined —This was all said and done with his usual seriousness on such occasions and, in spite of "everything we could say to the contrary, he actually "obliged us to take the money."

In the intercourse of fuminar life, he indulged his disposition to petulance and surcism, and thought himself injured if the hieratiousness of his raillery, the freedom of his censures, or the petulance of his fiolicks, was resented or repressed. He predominated over his companions with very light ascendency, and probably would bear none over whom he could not predominate. To give him advice was, in the style of his friend Delany, "to venture to speak to "him. This customary superiority soon grew too delicate for truth and Swift, with all his penetration, allowed himself to be delighted with low flatter,

On all common occasions, he habitually affects a style of arrogance, and dictates rather than persuades. This authoritative and magisterial language he expected to be received as his peculiar mode of jocularity but he apparently flattered his own arrogance by an assumed imperiousness, in which he was ironical only to the resentful, and to the submissive sufficiently serious.

He told stories with great fehrity, and delighted in doing what he knew himself to do well he was theretherefore captivated by the respectful silence of a steady listener, and told the same tales too often.

He did not, however, claim the right of talking alone, for it was his rule, when he had spoken a minute, to give room by a pause for any other speaker. Of time, on all occasions, he was an exact computer, and knew the minutes required to every common operation.

It may be justly supposed that there was in his conversation, what appears so frequently in his Letters, an affectation of familiarity with the Great, and ambition of momentary equality sought and enjoyed by the neglect of those ceremonies which custom has established as the barriers between one order of society and another. This transgression of regularity was by himself and his admirers termed greatness of soul But a great mind disdains to hold any thing by courtesy, and therefore never usuips what a lawful claimant may take away. He that encroaches on another's dignity, puts himself in his power, he is either repelled with helpless indignity, or endured by clemency and condescension.

Of Swift's general habits of thinking, if his Letters can be supposed to afford any evidence, he was not a man to be either loved or envied. He seems to have wasted life in discontent, by the rage of neglected pride, and the languishment of unsatisfied desire. He is querulous and fastidious, arrogant and malignant, he scarcely speaks of himself but with indignant lamentations, or of others but with insolent superiority when he is gay, and with angry contempt when he is gloomy. From the Letters that pass between him and Pope it might be inferred that they,

with

with Arbuthnot and Gay, had engrossed all the understanding and virtue of mankind that their merits filled the world, or that there was no hope of more They shew the age involved in darkness, and shade the picture with sullen emulation

When the Queen's death drove him into Ireland, he might be allowed to regret for a time the interception of his views, the extinction of his liopes, and his ejection from gay seenes, important employment, and plendid friendships but when time had carabled reason to prevail over vexation, the complaints, which at first were natural, became ridiculous because they were useless. But querulousness was now grown hibitual, and he cried out when he probably had ceused to feel. His reiterated wailings persuaded Bolingbroke that he was really willing to quit his deaners for an English parish, and Bolingbroke procured an exchange, which was rejected and Swift still retained the pleasure of compluning

The greatest difficulty that occurs, in analy sing his character, is to discover by what depravity of intellect he took delight in revolving ideas, from which almost every other mind shrinks with disgust. The ideas of pleasure, even when criminal, may sohert the imagination but what has disease, deformity, and filth, upon which the thoughts can be allured to dwell? Delany is willing to think that Swifts mind was not much trinted with this gross corruption before his long visit to Pope. He does not consider how he degrades his hero, by making him at fifty-nine the pup 1 of turpitide, and hable to the maliganant influence of an ascendant mind. But the truth is that Gulliver had described his Yahoos before the visit; and he that had formed those images had nothing filthy to learn.

I have here given the character of Swift as he exhibits himself to my perception; but now let another be heard who knew him better. Dr. Delany, after long acquaintance, describes him to Lord Orrery in these terms:

"My Lord, when you consider Swift's singular, " peculiar, and most varigated vein of wit, always "intended rightly, although not always so rightly "directed, delightful in many instances, and salu-"tary even where it is most offensive. when you " consider his strict truth, his fortitude in resisting "oppression and arbitrary power, his fidelity in "friendship; his sincere love and zeal for religion; "his upriglitness in making right resolutions, and " his steadiness in adhering to them, his care of his "" church, its clioir, its occonomy, and its income; " his attention to all those that preached in his ca-"thedral, in order to their amendment in pronuncia-"tion and style, as also his remarkable attention " to the interest of his successors, preferably to his " own present emoluments, his invincible patriotism, " even to a country which he did not love; his very "various, well-devised, well-judged, and extensive " charities, throughout his life, and his whole for-" tune (to say nothing of his wife's) conveyed to the " same Christian purposes at his death; charities, "from which he could enjoy no honour, advantage, " or satisfaction of any kind in this world, when " you consider his nonical and humoious, as well " as his serious schemes, for the promotion of true " reli"rehgion and virtue his success in soliciting for the "First Fruits and Twenticths, to the unspeakable benefit of the Lstablished Church of Ireland and his felicity (to rate it no higher) in giving occasion to the building of fifty new churches in I ondon

"All this considered, the character of his life, "will appear like that of his writings, they will both bear to be re-considered and re examined with the utmost attention, and always discover new beauties and excellences upon every examination."

"They will bear to be considered as the sun, in "which the brightness will hide the blemishes" and "whenever petulant ignorance, pride, inches, malice, make, "interposes to cloud or sully his "finic, I tal a upon inc to pro iounce, that the celipse "will not list long

"To conclude—No man ever de erved better of "any country, then Swift did of his a steady, "persevering, inflexible friend, a wise, a witchful, "and a futhful counsellor, under many severe trials "and bitter persecutions, to the manifest hazard "both of his liberty and fortune

"He lived a blessing, he died a benefactor, and "his name will ever live an honour, to Ireland'

IN the poetical works of Dr Swift there is not much upon which the critick can exercise his powers. They are often humorous, almost always light, and have the qualities which recommend such compositions, easiness and gaicty. They are, for the most part, what their author intended. The diction is correct, the numbers are smooth, and the rhymes exact. There seldom occurs a hard-laboured expression, or a redundant epithet, all his verses exemplify his own definition of a good style, they consist of "proper words in proper places"

To divide this collection into classes, and shew how some pieces are gross, and some are triffing, would be to tell the reader what he knows already, and to find faults of which the author could not be agnorant, who certainly wrote often not to his judgment, but his himoin

It was said, in a Pieface to one of the Irish editions, that Swift had never been known to take a single thought from any writer, ancient or modern. This is not literally true, but perhaps no writer can easily be found that has borrowed so little, or that in all his excellences and all his defects, has so well maintained his claim to be considered as original.

BROOME

WILLIAN BROOME was born in Cheshire, as is said, of very mean prients. Of the place of his birth, or the first part of his life, I have not been able to gain any intelligence. He was edu cated upon the foundation at Eton, and was cap tain of the school a whole year, without any vacancy, by which he might have obtained a scholarship at King's College. Being by this delay, such as is said to have hippened very rirely, superannuted, he was sent to St. John's College by the contributions of his friends, where he obtained a small exhibition.

At his college he lived for some time in the same chamber with the well known Ford, by whom I have formerly heard him described as a contracted scholar and a more versifier, unacquainted with life, and unskilful in conversation. His addiction to metre was then such, that his companions familiarly called him Poet. When he had opportunities of ninigling with mankind, he cleared himself, as Ford likewise owned, from great part of his scholastick rust.

Vol XI D He

He appeared early in the world as a translator of the "Ihads" into prose, in conjunction with Ozell and Oldisworth. How their several puris were distributed is not known. This is the translation of which Ozell boasted as superior, in Toland's opinion, to that of Pope it has long since vanished, and is now in no danger from the criticks.

He was introduced to Mi. Pope, who was then visiting Sir John Cotton at Ma lingley near Cambridge, and gained so much of his esteem, that he was employed, I believe, to make extracts from Eustathius for the notes to the translation of the "Iliad," and in the volumes of poetry published by Lintot, commonly called "Pope's Miscellanies," many of his early pieces were inserted.

Pope and Broome were to be yet more closely connected. When the success of the "Ihad" gave encouragement to a version of the "Odyssey,' Pope weary of the toil, called Fenton and Broome to his assistance; and, taking only half the work upon himself, divided the other half between his partners, giving four books to Fenton, and eight to Broome Fenton's books I have enumerated in his life; to the lot of Broome fell the second, sixth, eighth, eleventh, twelfth, sixteenth, eighteenth, and twenty-third, together with the burthen of writing all the notes

As this translation is a very important event in poetical history, the reader has a right to know upon what grounds I establish my narration. That the version was not wholly Pope's, was always known: he had mentioned the assistance of two friends in his proposals, and at the end of the work some account is given by Broome of their different parts, which which however mentions only five books as written by the coadjutors—the fourth and twentieth by I enton—the sixth, the cleventh, and the eighteenth, by himself—though Pope, in an advertisement prefixed afterwards to a new volume of his works, claimed only twelve—A natural curiosity, after the real conduct of so great in undertal ing, ineited me once to enquire of Dr Waiburton, who told ine, in his warm language, that he thought the relation given in the note—"a he—but that he was not able to ascertain" the several shares—The intelligence which Dr. Warburton could not afford nic, I obtained from Mr Langton, to whom Mr Spence had imparted it

The price at which Pope purchased this assistance was three hundred pounds paid to Fenton and five hundred to Broome, with as many copies as he wanted for his friends, which amounted to one hundred more. The payment made to Fenton I know not but by hensay. Broomes is very distinctly told by Pope, in the notes to the Duneral.

It is evident that, according to Popes own estimate Broome was and indity treated "If four books could ment three hundred pounds, eight and all the notes, equivalent at least to four, had certainly a right to more than six."

Broome probably considered funself as injured, and there was for some time more than coldness between him and his employer. He always spoke of Pope is foo much a lover of money and Pope pursued him with avowed hostility for he not only named him disrespectfully in the "Duneiad, but quoted him more than once in the "Bitlios, as a first pro-proficient in the "Art of Sinking;" and in his enumeration of the different kinds of poets distinguished for the profound, he reckons Broome among "the Pairots who repeat another's words in such a "hoarse odd tone as makes them seem their own." I have been told that they were afterwards reconciled; but I am afraid their peace was without friendship

He afterwards published a Miscellany of Poems, which is inserted, with corrections, in the late compilation

He never rose to a very high dignity in the Church. He was some time rector of Sturston in Suffolk, where he married a wealthy widow, and afterwards, when the Kingvisited Cambridge (1728) became Doctor of Laws He was (in August, 1728) presented by the Crown to the rectory of Pulham in Norfolk, which he held with Oakley Magna in Suffolk, given him by the Lord Cornwallis, to whom he was chaplain, and who added the vicarage of Eye in Suffolk; he then resigned Pulham, and retained the other two.

Towards the close of his life he grew again poetical, and amused himself with translating Odes of Anacreon, which he published in the "Gentleman's "Magazine," under the name of Chester.

He died at Bath, November 16, 1745, and was builed in the Abbey Church

Of Broome, though it cannot be said that he was a great poet, it would be unjust to deny that he was an excellent versifier, his lines are smooth and sonorous, and his diction is select and elegant. His rhymes are sometimes unsuitable; in his "Melancholy," he makes breath rhyme to birth in one place, and to earth in another. Those faults occur but seldom;

and he had such power of words and numbers as fitted him for translation but in his original works, recollection seems to have been his business more than invention. His imitations are so apparent, that it is part of his reader's employment to recall the verses of some former poet. Sometimes he copies the most popular writers, for he seems scarcely to endervour at concealment, and sometimes he picks up fragments in obscure corners. His lines to Penton,

Serene, the sting of pain thy thoughts beguile, And make afflictions objects of a smile, brought to my mind some lines on the death of Queen Mary, written by Barnes, of whom I should not have expected to find an imitator

But thou, O Muse! whose sweet nepenthean tongue Can charm the pangs of death with deathless song, Canst stinging plagues with easy thoughts begude, Make pains and tortures objects of a smile

To detect his illustrations were tedious and useless. What he takes he seldom makes worse and he cannot be justly thought a mean man, whom Pope chose for an associate, and whose co-operation was considered by Pope's enemies as so important, that he was attacked by Henley with this ludicrous distich

Pope came off clean with Homer but they say Broome went before, and kindly swept the way

POPE.

ALEXANDER POPE was born in London*, May 22, 1688, of parents whose rank or station was never ascertained we are informed that they were of "gentle blood," that his father was of a family of which the Earl of Downe was the head, and that his mother was the daughter of William Turner, Esquire, of York, who had likewise three sons, one of whom had the honour of being killed, and the other of dying, in the service of Charles the First, the third was made a general officer in Spain, from whom the sister inherited what sequestrations and forfeitures had left in the family

This, and this only, is told by Pope, who is more willing, as I have heard observed, to shew what his father was not, than what he was. It is allowed that he grew rich by trade, but whether in a shop or on the Exchange was never discovered till Mr. Tyers told, on the authority of Mrs. Racket, that he was a linen-draper in the Strand. Both parents were papists

In Lombard-street, according to Dr Warton C
Pope

Pope was from his birth of a constitution tender and delicate but is said to have shewn remarkable gentleness and sweetness of disposition. The weakness of his body continued through his hife* but the includes of his mind perhaps ended with his childhood. His voice when he was young, was so plensing, that he was called in fondness "the "hittle Nightingale."

Being not sent early to school, he was taught to read by an aunt and when he was seven or eight years old, became a lover of books. He first learned to write by imitating printed books a species of penmanship in which he retained great excellence through his whole life, though his ordinary hand was not elegant.

When he was about eight, he was placed in Hampshire under Taverner, a Romish priest, who, by a method very rarely practised, taught him the Greek and Latin rudiments together. He was now first regularly initiated in poetry by the perusal of "Ogilby's Homer, and "Sandy's Ovid Ogilby's resistance he never repud with any praise but of Sandy's he declared, in his notes to the "Hand, that English poetry owed much of its beauty to his translations. Sandy's very rarely attempted original composition.

From the carc of Taverner, under whom his proficiency was considerable, he was removed to a school

^{*} This weakness was so great that he constantly work stays as I have been a suiced by a waterman at Twickenham who in lifting lum into his boat had often felt them. His method of taking the arm on the water was to have a sedan char in the boat in which he at with the classes down. H at Twyford near Winchester, and again to another school about Hyde-park Corner, from which he used sometimes to stroll to the playhouse, and was so delighted with theatrical exhibitions, that he formed a kind of a play from "Ogilby's Iliad," with some verses of his own intermixed, which he persuaded his school-fellows to act, with the addition of his master's gardener, who personated Ajax

At the two last schools he used to represent houself as having lost part of what Taverner had taught him; and on his master at Twyford he had already exercised his poetry in a lampoon. Yet under those masters he translated more than a fourth part of the "Metamorphoses". If he kept the same proportion in his other exercises, it cannot be thought that his loss was great.

He tells of himself, in his poems, that "he hisp'd "in numbers," and used to say that he could not remember the time when he began to make verses. In the style of fiction it might have been said of him as of Pindai, that when he lay in his cradle, "the "bees swarmed about his mouth"

About the time of the Revolution, his father, who was undoubtedly disappointed by the sudden blast of Popish prosperity, quitted his trade, and retired to Binfield in Windsor Forest, with about twenty thousand pounds, for which, being conscientiously determined not to entrust it to the government, he found no better use than that of locking it up in a chest, and taking from it what his expences required, and his life was long enough to consume a great part of it, before his son came to the inheritance.

To Binfield Pope was called by his father when he was about twelve years old and there he had for a few months the assistance of one Deane, another priest, of whom he learned only to construe a little of "Tully's Offices How Mr Deane could spend, with a boy who had translated so much of "Ovid, some months over a small part of "Tully's Offices," it is now vain to enquire

Of a youth so successfully employed, and so conspicuously improved, a minute account must be naturally desired but currosity must be contented with confused, imperfect, and sometimes improbable intelligence. Pope, finding little advantage from external help, resolved thenceforward to due et himself, and at twelve formed a plan of study, which he completed with little other incitement than the desire of excellence.

His primary and principal purpose was to be a poet, with which his father accidentally concurred, by projosing subjects, and obliging him to correct his performances by many revisals after which the old gentleman, when he was satisfied, would say, if these are good rhymes!

In his perusal of the English poets he soon distinguished the versification of Dryden, which he considered as the model to be studied, and was impressed with such veneration for his instructor, that he persuaded some friends to take him to the coffee house which Dryden frequented, and pleased himself with having seen him

Dryden died May 1, 1701, some days before Pope was twelve so carly must he therefore have felt the power of harmony, and the zeal of genius Who does not wish that Diyden could have known the value of the homage that was paid him, and foreseen the greatness of his young admirer?

The earliest of Pope's productions is his "Ode" on Solitude," written before he was twelve, in which there is nothing more than other forward boys have attained, and which is not equal to Cowley's performances at the same age

His time was now wholly spent in reading and writing. As he read the Classicks, he amused himself with translating them; and at fourteen made a version of the first book of the "Thebais," which, with some revision, he afterwards published. He must have been at this time, if he had no help, a considerable proficient in the Latin tongue.

By Dryden's Fables, which had then been not long published, and were much in the hands of poetical readers, he was tempted to try his own skill in giving Chaucer a more fashionable appearance, and put "January and May," and the "Prologue of the Wife of Bath," into modern English. He translated likewise the Epistle of "Sappho to "Phaon" from Ovid, to complete the version which was before imperfect; and wrote some other small pieces, which he afterwards printed

He sometimes initated the English poets, and professed to have written at fourteen his poem upon "Silence," after Rochester's "Nothing." He had now formed his versification, and the smoothness of his numbers surpassed his original, but this is a small part of his praise, he discovers such acquaintance both with human life and public affairs, as is not easily conceived to have been attainable by a boy of fourteen in Windsor I orest

Next year he was desirous of opening to himself new sources of knowledge, by making himself ac quainted with modern languages and removed for a time to I ondon, that he might study I rench and Italian, which, as he desired nothing more than to read them, were by diligent application soon dispatched. Of Italian learning he does not appear to have ever made much use in his subsequent studies

He then returned to Binfield, and delighted himself with his own poetry. He tried all styles, and many subjects. He wrote a comedy, a trigedy, an epicl poem, with paneryriels on all the princes of Europe and, as he confe es, "thought himself "the greatest genius thictories. Self confidence is the first requisite to great undertakings. He, indeed, who forms his opinion of himself in solutide, without knowing the powers of other men, is very liable to erroir but it was the filterty of Pope to rate himself at his real value."

Most of his puerile productions were, by his maturer judgment, afterwards destroyed "Alcander," the epic poem, was burnt by the persuasion of Atterbury. The tragedy was founded on the legend of St. Genevieve. Of the comedy there is no account.

Concerning his studies it is related, that he translated "Tully on Old Age and that, besides his books of poetry and entieism, he read "Femple's "Essays and "Locke on Human Understanding His reading, though his favourite authors are not known, appears to have been sufficiently extensive and multifarious; for his early pieces shew, with sufficient evidence, his knowledge of books.

He that is pleased with himself easily imagines that he shall please others. Sir William Trumbull, who had been ambassador at Constantinople, and secretary of state, when he retired from business, fixed his residence in the neighbourhood of Binfield. Pope, not yet sixteen, was introduced to the statesman of sixty, and so distinguished himself, that their interviews ended in friendship and correspondence. Pope was, through his whole life, ambitious of splendid acquaintance; and he seems to have wanted neither diligence nor success in attracting the notice of the great; for, from his first entrance into the world, and his entrance was very early, he was admitted to familiarity with those whose rank or station made them most conspicuous

From the age of sixteen the life of Pope, as an author, may be properly computed. He now wrote his pastorals, which were shewn to the poets and criticks of that time, as they well deserved, they were read with admiration, and many praises were bestowed upon them and upon the Preface, which is both elegant and learned in a high degree; they were, however, not published till five years afterwards.

Cowley, Milton, and Pope, are distinguished among the English Poets by the early exertion of their powers, but the works of Cowley alone were published in his childhood, and therefore of him only can it be certain that his puerile performances received no improvement from his maturer studies.

At this time began his requaintance with Wischerley, a man who seems to have had among his contemporaries his full share of reputation, to have been esteemed without virtue, and caressed without good-humour. Pope was proud of his notice. Wy cherley wrote verses in his pruse, which he was charged by Dennis with writing to himself, and they agreed for a while to flatter one mother. It is pleasant to remark how soon Pope learned the cant of an author, and legan to treat criticle with contempt, though he had yet suffered nothing from them.

But the fondness of Wycherley was too violent to last. His esteem of Pope was such, that he sub-initied some poems to his revision, and when Pope, perhaps proud of such confidence, was sufficiently bold in his criticisms, and liberal in his alterations the old scribbler was angry to see his pages defaced and felt more pain from the detection than content from the amendment of his fulls. They parted but Pope always considered him with kindness and visited him a little time before he died.

An alter of in cirly correspondents was Mr Cromwell, of whom I live learned nothing parties his but that he used to ride a hunting in a tye was fond, and perhaps van, of animong hunsi if with poetry and criticism, and sometimes sent his performances to Pope, who did not forbers such remarks as were now and then unwelcome. Pope, in his turn, put the juvenile version of "Status" into his hands for correction

Their correspondence afforded the publick its first knowledge of Popes epistolary powers for his I et ters were given by Croinwell to one Mrs Thomas and she many years afterwards sold them to Curli, who inserted them in a volume of his Miscellaines

Walsh, a name yet preserved among the minor poets, was one of his first encouragers. His regard was gained by the Pastorals, and from him Pope received the counsel by which he seems to have regulated his studies. Walsh advised him to correctness, which, as he told him, the English poets had hitherto neglected, and which therefore was left to him as a basis of fame, and being delighted with rural poems, recommended to him to write a pastoral comedy, like those which are read so eagerly in Italy, a design which Pope probably did not approve, as he did not follow it.

Pope had now declared himself a poet, and thinking himself entitled to poetical conversation, began at seventeen to frequent Will's, a coffee-house on the north side of Russel-street in Covent-garden, where the wits of that time used to assemble, and where Dryden had, when he lived, been accustomed to preside.

During this period of his life he was indefatigably diligent, and insatiably curious, wanting health for violent, and money for expensive pleasures, and having excited in himself very strong desires of intellectual eminence, he spent much of his time over his books; but he read only to store his mind with facts and images, seizing all that his authors presented with undistinguishing voracity, and with an appetite for knowledge too eager to be nice. In a mind like his, however, all the faculties were at once involuntarily improving. Judgment is forced upon us by experience. He that reads many books must compare

' little

one opinion or one style with mother and, when he compares, must nece sarily distinguish, reject, and prefix. But the recount given by himself of his studies was, that from fourteen to twenty he read only for amusement, from twenty in twenty seven for improvement and instruction that in the fir t part of this time he desired only to know, and in the second he endervoired to judge

The pastorals, which had been for some time limited about among poets and criticks, were at last printed (1709) in Tonsinis Miscellant, in a volume which began with the Pastorals of Philips, and ended with those of Pope

The same year was written the "Essay on Criti" cism, a work which displays such extent of comprehension, such necty of distinction, such acquaint ance with mankind, and such knowledge both of in each and modern learning as are not often attained by the maturestage and longest experience. It was published about two years afterwards and, being prused by Ad lison in the "Spectator * with sufficient liberality, nict with so much I wour as enraged Dennis" who, he says, "found him elf attacked, "without any manner of provocation on his side, and "attacked in his person, instead of his writings, by "one who was wholly a stranger to him, at a time "when all the world lines he was persecuted by "tortune and not only saw that this was attempted in a clandestine manner, with the utmost falsehood "and calcumny, but found that full this was done by a

^{*}No 2.3 But according to Dr Warton Pope was displeased at one pa sage in which Adds on centures the admission of some strokes of ill insture.

" little affected hypocrite, who had nothing in his mouth at the came time but truth, caudoui, friend"ship, good-nature, humanity, and magnanimity."

How the attack was clandestine is not easily perceived, nor how his person is depreciated, but he seems to have known something of Pope's character, in whom may be discovered an appetite to talk too frequently of his own virtues.

The pamphlet is such as rage might be expected to dictate. He supposes himself to be asked two questions, whether the Essay will succeed, and who or what is the author

Its success he admits to be secured by the false opinions then prevalent; the author he concludes to be "young and law."

"First, because he discovers a sufficiency beyond his little ability, and hath rashly undertaken a task

"infinitely above his force Secondly, while this " little author struts, and affects the dictatorian air,

" he plainly shews, that at the same time he is under "the rod and, while he pretends to give laws to " others, is a pedantick slave to authority and opinion.

"Thirdly, he hath, like school-boys, borrowed both

" from hving and dead Fourthly, he knows not

" his own mind, and frequently contradicts himself.

"Fifthly, he is almost perpetually in the wrong."

All these positions he attempts to prove by quotations and remarks, but his desire to do mischief is greater than his power. He has, however, justly criticised some passages in these lines:

There are whom Heaven has bless'd with store of Wit, Yet want as much again to manage it,

For Wit and Judgment ever are at strife

It is apparent that wit has two meanings, and that what is wanted, though called wit, is truly judgment. So far Dennis is undoubtedly right, but not content with argument, he will have a little mirth, and triumphs over the first couplet in terms too elegant to be forgotten. By the way, what rare "numbers are here! Would not one swear that this "joungster had espoused some antiquated Muse, "who had sued out a divorce on account of impositence from some superminusted sinner and, having been p—ded by her former spouse, has got the gout "in her decrepit age, which males her hobble so "damnably. This was the man who would reform a nation sinking into barbanty.

In another place Pope lumself allowed that Dennis had detected one of those blunders which are called "bulls The first edition had this line,

What is this wit-

Where wanted scorn'd, and envied where acquired?

"How, says the critick, "can wit be scorn d where "it is not? Is not this a figure frequently employed "in Hiberman land? The person that wants this wit "may indeed he scorned, but the scorn shews the "honour which the contemner has for wit Of this remark Pope made the proper use, by correcting the passage

I have preserved, I think, all that is reasonable in Denniss criticism it remains that justice be done to his delicacy. "For his acquaintance (says Dennis) "he names Mr Walsh, who had by no means "the qualification which the author reckons absolutely necessary to a critick, it being very certain Vol. XI." "that

"that he was, like this Essayer, a very indifferent " poet; he loved to be well-dressed, and I remem $m ``be_1$ a little young gentleman whom m Mr. Walsh used " to take into his company, as a double foil to his per-" son and capacity. Enquire, between Sunning-hill " and Oakingham, for a young, short, squab gentle-" man, the very bow of the God of Love, and tell me "whether he be a proper author to make personal "reflections? He may extol the ancients, but he " has reason to thank the gods that he was born a " modein, for had he been born of Grecian parents, "and his father consequently had by law had the "absolute disposal of him, his life had been no "longer than that of one of his poems, the life of "half a day Let the person of a gentleman of his " parts be never so contemptible, his inward man " is ten times more ridiculous; it being impossible " that his outward form, though it be that of down-" 11ght monkey, should differ so much from human "shape, as his unthinking, immaterial part does "from human understanding" Thus began the hostility between Pope and Dennis, which, though it was suspended for a short time, never was appeased. Pope seems, at first, to have attacked him wantonly: but, though he always professed to despise him, he discovers, by mentioning him very often, that he felt his force or his venom.

Of this Essay, Pope declared, that he did not expect the sale to be quick, because "not one gentle-"man in sixty, even of liberal education, could un-"derstand it". The gentlemen, and the education of that time, seem to have been of a lower character than they are of this He mentioned a thousand copies as a numerous impression

Dennis was not lis only censurer the zealous Papists thought the monks treated with too much contempt, and Erasmus too studiously praised but to these objections he had not much regard

The "Essay" has been truislated into French by Hamilton, author of the "Comte de Grammont, whose version was never printed, by Robotham, secretary to the King for Hanover, and by Resuel and commented by Di Warburton, who has discovered in it such order and connection as was not perceived by Addison, nor, as is said, intended by the author

Almost every poem, consisting of precepts, is so far arbitrary and immethodical, that many of the paragraphs may change places with no apparent inconvenience for of two or more positions, depending upon some remo e and general principle, there is seldom any cogent reason why one should precede the other But for the order in which they stand, whatever it be, a little ingenuity may easily give a reason "It is possible, says Hooker, "that, by long cir-" cumduction, from my one truth all truth may be Of all homogeneous trutles, at least of " inferred all truths respecting the same general end, in whatever series they may be produced, a concatenation by intermediate ideas may be formed, such as, when it is once shewn, shall appear natural but if this order be reversed another mode of connection equally specious may be found or made Aristotle is prai ed for naming I ortitude first of the eardinal virtues as that without which no other virtue can steadily be practised; but he inight, with equal propriety, have placed Prudence and Justice before it, since without Prudence Fortitude is mad; without Justice, it is mischievous

As the end of method is perspicuity, that series is sufficiently regular that avoids obscurity, and where there is no obscurity, it will not be difficult to discover method

In the Spectator was published the "Messiali," which he first submitted to the perusal of Steele, and corrected in compliance with his criticisms

It is reasonable to infer, from his Letters, that the verses on the "Unfortunate Lady" were written about the time when his "Essay" was published. The Lady's name and adventures I have sought with fruitless enquiry.

I can therefore tell no more than I have learned from Mr Ruffhead, who writes with the confidence of one who could trust his information. She was a woman of eminent rank and large fortune, the ward of an uncle, who, having given her a proper education, expected like other guardians that she should make at least an equal match, and such he proposed to her, but found it rejected in favour of a young gentleman of inferior condition.

Having discovered the correspondence between the two lovers, and finding the young lady determined to abide by her own choice, he supposed that separation might do what can rarely be done by arguments, and sent her into a foreign country, where she was obliged to converse only with those from whom her uncle had nothing to fear

Her lover took care to repeat his vows, but his letters were intercepted and carried to her guardian, who directed her to be watched with still greater vigilance, till of this restraint slie grew so imputent, that she bribed a woman servant to procure her a sword, which she directed to her heart

Trom this account, given with evident intention to raise the Lady's character, it does not appear that she had any claim to praise, nor much to compassion. She seems to have been impatient, violent, and ungovernable. Her uncles power could not have lasted long the hour of liberty and choice would have come in time. But her desires were too hot for delay, and she liked self murder better than suspence.

Nor is it discovered that the uncle, whoever he was, is with much justice delivered to posterity is "a false Guardian" he seems to have done only that for which a guardian is appointed he ender-voured to direct his niece till she should be able to direct herself. Poetry has not often been worse employed than in dignifying the amorous fury of a raving girl

Not long after, he wrote the "Rape of the Locl, the most airy, the most ingenious, and the most delightful of all his compositions, occasioned by a frouck of gallantry, rather too familiar in which Lord Petre cut off a lock of Mrs Aiabella Termors hair This, whether stealth or violence, was so much resented, that the commerce of the two families, before

fore very friendly, was interrupted. Mr. Caryl, a gentleman who, being secretary to King James's Queen, had followed his Mistress into France, and who, being the author of "Sir Solomon Single," a comedy, and some translations, was entitled to the notice of a Wit, solicited Pope to endeavour a reconciliation by a ludicrous poem, which might bring both the parties to a better temper In compliance with Caryl's request, though his name was for a long time marked only by the first and last letter, C 1, a poem of two cantos was written (1711), as is said, in a fortnight, and sent to the offended Lady, who liked it well enough to show it; and, with the usual process of literary transactions, the author, dieading a surreptitious edition, was forced to publish it

The event is said to have been such as was desired, the pacification and diversion of all to whom it related except Sir George Brown, who complained with some bitterness, that, in the character of Sir Plume, he was made to talk nonsense. Whether all this be true I have some doubt, for at Paris, a few years ago, a niece of Mrs Fermor, who presided in an English Convent, mentioned Pope's work with very little gratitude, rather as an insult than an honour, and she may be supposed to have inherited the opinion of her family.

At its first appearance it was termed by Addison "merum sal" Pope, however, saw that it was capable of improvement, and, having luckily contrived to borrow his machinery from the Rosiciucians, imparted the scheme with which his head was teeming to Addison, who told him that his work, as it stood, stood, was "a delicious little thing," and gave him no encouragement to retouch it

This has been too hastily considered as an instance of Addison's jealousy for, as he could not guess the conduct of the new design, or the possibilities of pleasure comprised in a fiction in which there had been no examples, he might very reasonably and kindly persuade the author to acquiesce in his own prosperity, and forbear an attempt which he considered as an unnecessary bright.

Addison's counsel was happily rejected. Pope foresaw the future efflorescence of imagery then budding in his mind, and resolved to spire no art, or in dustry of cultivation. The soft luxurince of his fancy was already shooting, and all the gay varieties of diction were ready at his hand to colour and embellish it.

His attempt was justified by its success. The term Rape of the Lock strads forward, in the classes of literature as the most exquisite example of ludicrous poetry. Berkeley congratulated him upon the display of powers more truly poetical than he had shewn before with elegance of description and justices of precepts, he had now exhibited boundless fertility of invention.

He always considered the intermixture of the machiner, with the action as his most successful exertion of poetical art. He indeed could never afterwards produce any thing of such unexampled excellence. Those performances, which strike with wonder, are combinations of skilful genius with happy casualty, and it is not likely that any felicity, like the

the discovery of a new race of preternatural agents, should happen twice to the same man

Of this poem the author was, I think, allowed to enjoy the praise for a long time without disturbance. Many years afterwards Dennis published some remarks upon it, with very little force, and with no effect; for the opinion of the publick was already settled, and it was no longer at the mercy of criticism.

About this time he published the "Temple of "Fame," which, as he tells Steele in their correspondence, he had written two years before, that is, when he was only twenty-two years old, an culy time of life for so much learning, and so much observation as that work exhibits.

On this poem Dennis afterwards published some remarks, of which the most reasonable is, that some of the lines represent Motion as exhibited by Sculpture.

Of the Epistle from "Eloisa to Abelard," I do not know the date His first inclination to attempt a composition of that tender kind arose, as Mi Savage told me, from his perusal of Prior's "Nut-brown "Maid" How much he has surpassed Prior's work it is not necessary to mention, when perhaps it may be said with justice, that he has excelled every composition of the same kind. The mixture of religious hope and resignation gives an elevation and dignity to disappointed love, which images merely natural cannot bestow. The gloom of a convent strikes the imagination with far greater force than the solitude of a grove.

Ţhis

This piece was, however, not much his fivourite an his latter years, though I never heard upon what principle he slighted it

In the next year (1713) he published "Windsor "Forest of which part was, as he relates, written at sixteen, about the same time as his Pistorals and the latter part was added afterwards where the addition begins, we are not told. The lines relating to the peace confess their own date. It is dedicated to Lord Lansdowne, who was then high in reputation and influence among the Tories and it is said, that the conclusion of the poem give great pain to Addison, both as a poet and a politician Reports like this are often spread with boldness very disproportionate to their evidence Why should Addison receive any particular disturbance from the last lines of "Windsor Forest? If contraricty of opinion could porson a politician, he would not live a day and, as a poet he must have felt Pope's force of genius much more from many other parts of his works

The pain that Addison might feel it is not likely that he would confess and it is certain that he so well suppressed his discontent, that Pope now thought himself his favourite for, having been consulted in the revisal of "Cato, he introduced it, by a Prologue and, when Dennis published his Remarl's, undertook, not indeed to vindicate, but to revenge his friend, by a "Narrative of the Frenzy of John "Dennis

There is reason to believe that Addison go e no encouragement to this disingenuous hostility for, says Pope, in a letter to him, "indeed voin opinion,

"that 'tis entirely to be neglected, would be my own in my own case, but I felt more warmth here than I did when I first saw his book against myself "(though indeed in two minutes it made me "heartily merry)". Addison was not a man on whom such cant of sensibility could make much impression. He left the pamphlet to itself, having disowned it to Dennis, and perhaps did not think Pope to have deserved much by his officiousness.

This year was printed in the "Guardian" the ironical comparison between the Pistorals of Philips and Pope, a composition of artifice, criticism, and literature, to which nothing equal will easily be found. The superiority of Pope is so ingeniously dissembled, and the feeble lines of Philips so skilfully preferred, that Steele, being deceived, was unwilling to print the paper, lest Pope should be offended. Addison immediately saw the writer's design, and, as it seems, had malice enough to concert his discovery, and to permit a publication which, by making his friend Philips ridiculous, made him for ever an enemy to Pope

It appears that about this time Pope had a strong inclination to unite the art of Painting with that of Poetry, and put himself under the tuition of Jervas. He was near-sighted, and therefore not formed by nature for a painter the tired, however, how far he could advance, and sometimes persuaded his friends to sit A picture of Betterton, supposed to be drawn by him, was in the possession of Lord Mansfield?:

^{*} It is still at Caen Wood. N

if this was taken from the life, he must have begun to print earlier—for Betterton was now dead—Pope's ambition of this new art produced some encomiastick verses to Jervas, which certainly shew his power as a poet—but I have been told that they betrry his ignorance of painting—

He appears to have regarded Betterton with kindness and esteem and after his death published under his name, a version into modern English of Chaucer's Prologues, and one of his Tales, which, as was related by Mr. Harte, were believed to have been the performance of Pope himself by Penton, who made him a gay offer of five pounds, if he would shew them in the hand of Betterton

The next year (1713) produced a bolder attempt, by which profit was sought as well as praise. The poems which he had hitherto written, however they might have diffused his name, had made very little addition to his fortune. The allowance which his father made him, though, proportioned to what he had, it might be liberd, could not be large his religion hindered him from the occupation of any civil employment, and he complained that he wanted even money to buy books *

He therefore resolved to try how far the favour of the publick extended, by soliciting a subscription to a version of the "Iliad, with large notes

To print by subscription was, for some time, a practice peculiar to the English The first conside rable work, for which this expedient was employed, is said to have been Diyden's "Viigil," and it had been tried again with great success when the "Tat-"lers" were collected into volumes.

There was reason to believe that Pope's attempt would be successful. He was in the full bloom of reputation, and was personally known to almost all whom dignity of employment or splendour of reputation had made eminent, he conversed indifferently with both parties, and never disturbed the publick with his political opinions, and it might be naturally expected; as each faction then boasted its literary zeal, that the great men, who on other occasions practised all the violence of opposition, would emulate each other in their encouragement of a poet who had delighted all, and by whom none had been offended.

With those hopes, he offered an English "Iliad" to subscribers, in six volumes in quarto, for six guineas, a sum, according to the value of money at that time, by no means inconsiderable, and greater than I believe to have been ever asked before. His proposal, however, was very favourably received, and the patrons of literature were busy to recommend his undertaking, and promote his interest. Lord Oxford, indeed, lamented that such a genius should be wasted upon a work not original, but proposed no means by which he might live without it Addison recommended caution and moderation, and advised him not to be content with the praise of half the nation, when he might be universally favoured.

The

[&]quot;Earlier than this, viz in 1688, Milton's "Paradise Lost" had been published with great success by subscription, in folio, under the pationage of Mi (afterwards Lord) Someis R

The greatness of the désign, the popularity of the author, and the attention of the literary world, naturally raised such expectations of the future sale, that the booksellers made their offers with great ergerness but the highest bidder was Bernard Lintot, who became proprietor on condition of supplying at his own expence all the copies which were to be delivered to subscribers, or presented to friends, and paying two hundred pounds for every volume

Of the Quartos it was, I believe, stipulated that none should be printed but for the author, that the subscription might not be depreciated but Lintot impressed the same pages upon a small Folio, and paper perhaps a little thinner and sold exactly at half the price, for half a guinea each volume, books so little inferior to the Quartos, that by a fraud of trade, those I olios, being afterwards shortened by cutting many the top and bottom, were sold as copies printed for the subscribers

Lintot printed two hundred and fifty on royal paper in Folio, for two guiners a volume of the small Folio, having printed seventeen hundred and fifty copies of the first volume, he reduced the number in the other volumes to a thousand

It is unpleasant to relate that the bookseller, after all his hopes and all his liberality, was, by a very unjust and illegal action, defrauded of his profit An edition of the l'nglish "Ind was printed in Holland in Duodeeimo, and imported clandestinely for the gratification of those who were impatient to read what they could not yet afford to buy. This flaud could only be counteracted by an edition equally cheap and more commodious and Lintot was compelled pelled to contract his folio at once into a duodecimo, and lose the advantage of an intermediate gradation. The notes, which in the Dutch copies were placed at the end of each book, as they had been in the large volumes, were now subjoined to the text in the same page, and are therefore more easily consulted. Of this edition two thousand five hundred were first printed, and five thousand a few weeks afterwards; but indeed great numbers were necessary to produce considerable profit.

Pope, having now emitted his proposals, and engaged not only his own reputation, but in some degree that of his friends who patronised his subscription, began to be frighted at his own undertaking; and finding himself at first embarrassed with difficulties, which retarded and oppressed him, he was far a time timorous and uneasy, had his nights disturbed by dreams of long journeys through unknown ways, and wished, as he said, "that somebody would hang "him ""

This misery, however, was not of long continuance, he grew by degrees more acquainted with Homer's images and expressions, and practice increased his facility of versification. In a short time he represents himself as dispatching regularly fifty verses a-day, which would shew him by an easy computation the termination of his labour

His own diffidence was not his only vexation. He that asks a subscription soon finds that he has enemies. All who do not encourage him, defame him. He that wants money will rather be thought angry than poor and he that wishes to save his money conceals

Ins avarice by his malice. Addison had hinted his suspicion that Pope was too much a Fory and some of the Tories suspected his principles because he had contributed to the "Guardian, which was carried on by Steele.

To those who censured his politicks were added enemies yet more dangerous, who called in question his knowledge of Greek, and his qualifications for a trunslator of Homer To these he made no publick opposition but in one of his Letters escapes from them as well as he can At an age like his, for he was not more than twenty-five, with an irregular education, and a course of life of which much seems to have passed in conversation, it is not very likely that he overflowed with Greek But when he felt lumself deficient lie sought a stance and what man of learning would refuse to help lum? Minute enquiries into the force of words are less necessary in translating Homer than other poets, because his positions are general, and his representations natural, with very little dependence on local or temporary customs, on those changeable scenes of artificial life, which, by mingling original with accidental notion, and crowding the mind with images which time effaces, produces ambiguity in diction, and obscurity in books. To this open display of unadulterated nature it must be ascribed, that Homei has fewer passages of doubtful meaning than any other poet read of a man, who being, by his ignorance of Greek, compelled to gratify his curiosity with the Latin printed on the opposite page, declared that, from the rude simplicity of the lines literally rendcred.

dered, he formed nobler ideas of the Homeric majesty, than from the laboured elegance of polished versions.

Those literal translations were always at hand, and from them he could easily obtain his author's sense with sufficient certainty, and among the readers of Homer the number is very small of those who find much in the Greek more than in the Latin, except the musick of the numbers

If more help was wanting, he had the poetical translation of "Eobanus Hessus," an unwerned writer of Latin verses, he had the French Homers of La Valterie and Dacier, and the English of Chapman, Hobbes, and Ogilby With Chapman, whose work, though now totally neglected, seems to have been popular almost to the end of the last century, he had very hequent consultations, and perhaps never translated any passage till he had read his version, which indeed he has been sometimes suspected of using instead of the original.

Notes were likewise to be provided, for the six volumes would have been very little more than six pamphlets without them. What the mere perusal of the text could suggest, Pope wanted no assist mee to collect or methodize, but more was necessary; many pages were to be filled, and learning must supply materials to wit and judgment. Something might be gathered from Dacier, but no man loves to be indebted to his contemporaries, and Dacier was accessible to common readers. Eustathius was therefore necessarily consulted. To read Eustathius, of whose work there was then no Latin version, I suspect Pope, if he had been willing, not to have been

been able some other was therefore to be found, who had lessure as well as abilities and he was doubtless most readily employed who would do much worl for little money

The history of the notes has never been traced Broome, in his preface to his poeins, declares himself the commentator " in part upon the Ihad and it appears from Penton's Letter, preserved in the Museum, that Broome was at first engaged in consulting Eustathius but that after a time, whatever was the reason, he desisted another man of Cambridge was then employed who soon grew wears of the work and a third, that was recommended by Thirlby, is now discovered to have been Jortin, a man since well known to the learned world, who complained that Pope, having accepted and approved his performance, never testified any curiosity to see hun, and who professed to have forgotten the terms on which he worked The terms which Fenton uses are very mercantile "I think at first sight that his " performance is very commendable, and have sent " word for him to mish the 17th bool, and to send "it with his demands for his trouble. I have here "enclosed the specimen of the rest come before the return, I will keep them till I receive your " order

Broome then offered his service a second time, which was probably accepted, as they had afterwards a closer correspondence. Purnell contributed the Life of Homer, which Pope found so haish, that he took great pains in correcting it and by his own diligence, with such help as kindness or money could procure him, in omewhat more than five years.

he completed his version of the "Iliad," with the notes. He began it in 1712, his twenty-fifth year; and concluded it in 1718, his thirtieth year.

When we find him translating fifty lines a day, it is natural to suppose that he would have brought his work to a more speedy conclusion. The "Iliad," containing less than sixteen thousand verses, might have been dispatched in less than three hundred and twenty days by fifty verses in a day. The notes, compiled with the assistance of his mercenaises, could not be supposed to require more time than the text.

According to this calculation, the progress of Pope may seem to have been slow, but the distance is commonly very great between actual performances and speculative possibility. It is natural to suppose, that as much as has been done to-day may be done to-morrow, but on the morrow some difficulty emerges, or some external impediment obstructs. Indolence, interruption, business, and pleasure, all take their turns of retardation, and every long work is lengthened by a thousand causes that can, and ten thousand that cannot, be recounted. Perhaps no extensive and multifarious performance was ever effected within the term originally fixed in the undertaker's mind. He that runs against Time has an antagonist not subject to casualties.

The encouragement given to this translation, though report seems to have over-rated it, was such as the world has not often seen. The subscribers were five hundred and seventy-five. The copies, for which subscriptions were given, were six hundred and fifty-four and only six hundred and sixty were printed. For these copies Pope had nothing to pay he therefore received, including the two hundred pounds a volume, five thousand three hundred and twenty pounds four shillings' without deduction, as the books were supplied by Lintot

By the success of his subscription Pope was relieved from those peruniary distresses with which, not withstanding his popularity, he had litherto struggled Lord Oxford had often lamented his disquadification for publick employment, but never proposed a pension. While the trunslation of "Homer was in its progress, Mr. Criggs, then eccretary of state, offered to procure him a pension, which, at least during his ministry, might be enjoyed with secrecy. This was not accepted by Pope, who told him, however, that, if he should be pressed with want of money, he would send to him for occasional supplies. Criggs was not long in power, and was never solicited for money by Pope, who disdained to beg what he did not want.

With the product of this subscription, which he had too much discretion to squander, he secured his future life from want, by considerable annuities. The estate of the Duke of Buckinghum was found to have been charged with five hundred pounds a year, payable to Pope, which doubtless his translition enabled him to purchase.

It cannot be unwelcome to literary curiosity, that I deduce thus minutely the listory of the English "Ihad It is certainly the noblest version of poetry which the world has ever seer, and its publication must therefore be considered as one of the great events in the annals of Learning

To those who have skill to estimate the excellence and difficulty of this great work, it must be very desirable to know how it was performed, and by what gradations it advanced to correctness. Of such an intellectual process the knowledge has very rarely been attainable, but happily there remains the original copy of the "Hiad," which, being obtained by Bolingbroke as a curiosity, descended from him to Mallet, and is now, by the solicitation of the late Dr Maty, reposited in the Museum.

Between this manuscript, which is written upon accidental fragments of paper, and the printed edition, there must have been an intermediate copy, that was perhaps destroyed as it returned from the press

From the first copy I have procured a few transcripts, and shall exhibit first the printed lines, then, in a small print, those of the manuscripts, with all their variations. Those words in the small print, which are given in Italicks, are cancelled in the copy, and the words placed under them adopted in their stead

The beginning of the first book stand thus;
The wrath of Peleus' son, the direful spring
Of all the Grecian woes, O Goddess, sing,
That wrath which hurl'd to Pluto's gloomy reign
The souls of mighty chiefs untimely slain
The stern Pelides' rage, O Goddess, sing

Of all the woes of Greece the fatal spring, Greenan

That strew'd with uarriors dead the Phrygian plain, he loes

And peopled the dark hell with heroes slain, fill'd the shady hell with chiefs untimely

Whose

Whose limbs, unburied on the naked shore, Devouring dogs and linner, vultures tore, Since great Achilles and Atrides strove, Such was the sovereign doom, and such the will of Jove

Whose limbs unburied on the ho tile shore. Devouring dogs and greedy vultures tore Since, first Atrides and Achilles strove Such was the overeign doom and such the will of Jove

Declare, O Muse, in what ill fated hour Spring the fierce strife, from what offended Power? Laton's son a dire contagion spread, And heap d the camp with mountains of the dead, The King of men his reverend priest defy d, And for the King's offence the people dy d

Declare O Godde s what offended Power Enflam d their rage in that ill omen d hour anger fatal, hapless

Phobus lumself the dire debate procur d fierce

T avenge the wrongs his mur d priest endur d, for this the God a dire infection spread And heap d the camp with millions of the dead The King of Men the Sacred Sire defy d And for the King's officee the people dy d

For Chryses sought with costly gifts to gun His captive daughter from the Vietor's chain, Suppliant the venerable Father stands, Apollo's awful ensigns grace his bands, By these he begs, and lowly hending down, Extends the sceptre and the laurel crown

For Chry es sought by presents to regain eastly gifts to gain

His captive daughter from the Victor's cliain Suppliant the venerable Father stands Apollo's awful ensigns graed his hand By these he begs, and, lowly bending down The golden scriptre and the laurel crown, Presents the sceptre For these as ensure of his God he bare, The God that sends his golden shafts afar. Then low on earth, the sememble min, Suppliant before the brother kings began

He sued to all, but chief implor'd for grace,
The brother kings of Atrens' royal race;
Ye kings and warriours, may your vows be crown'd,
And Troy's proud walls he level with the ground,
May Jove restore you, when your toils are o'er,
Safe to the pleasures of your native shore

To all he sucd, but chief imploid for grace. The brother kings of Atreus royal rice. Ye sons of Atreus, may your your be crowned, Kings an I warriors.

Your labours, by the Gods be all your labours crown d, So may the Gods your arms with conquest bless,

And Troy's proud walls he level with the ground,

Till laid

And crown your labours with desert d success, May Jove restore you, when your toils are our, Safe to the pleasures of your mative shore.

But, oh! relieve a wretched parent's prin, And give Chryseis to these arms again, If mercy fail, yet let my present move, And dread avenging Phæbus, son of Jove

But, oh 1 relieve a hapless parent's pain,
And give my daughter to these arms again,
Receive my gifts, if mercy fails, yet let my present move,
And fear the God that deals his darts around, avenging Phæbus, son of Jove.

The Greeks, in shouts, their joint assent declare The priest to reverence, and release the fair.

Not

Not so Atrides hie with kingly pilde, Repuls d the sacred Sire, and thus reply d

He said the Creeks then joint a. ent declare The father said the gearous Greeks relent Tacepet the ransom and release the fur Pewere the priest and speak their joint assent Not so the tyrant he with lingly pride

Atrides

Reput d the sacred Sire and thus reply d
[Not so the tyrint Drives]

Of these lines, and of the whole first book, I am told that there was vet a former copy, more varied, and more deformed with interlineations

The beginning of the second book varies very little from the printed page, and is therefore set down without a parallel, the few differences do not require to be elaborately displayed

Now pleasing sleep had seal deach mortal eye Stretch dim their tents the Greeian leaders he, The Immortals slumber do no their thrones above, All but the ever watchful eye of Jose To honour Thetis son he bends his care, And plunge the Greeks in all the woes of war. Then bids an empty phantom rise to sight And thus commands the vision of the night directs.

Liv hence, delivate theam, and, light as any

Fly hence, delusive dieam, and, light as air,
To Agamemnon's royal tun rep ur,
Bid lim in arms draw forth the embattled trun,
Warch all lins legions to the dusty plain
Now tell the Aing—tis given him to destroy Declare even now
The lofty walls of wide extended Troy, tow is

For now no more the Gods with Fate contend, At Juno's suit the heavenly factions end Destruction hovers o'er you devoted wall, hangs

And nodding Ihum waits th' impending fall Invocation to the catalogue of Ships.

Say, Viigins, seated found the throne divine,
All-knowing Goddesses! immortal Nine!
Since Earth's wide regions, Heaven's unmeasur'd height,
And Hell's abyss, hide nothing from your sight,
(We, wretched mortals! lost in doubts below,
But guess by rumour, and but boast we know)
Oh! say what heroes, fir'd by thirst of fame,
Or uig'd by wrongs, to Troy's destruction came!
To count them all demands a thousand tongues,
A throat of brass and adamantine lungs

Now, Virgin Goddesses, Immortal Nine!
That round Olympus' heavenly summit share
Who see through Heaven and Earth, and Hell profound,
And all things know, and all things can resound!
Relate what armies sought the Tropin land,
What nations follow'd, and what chie's command,
(For doubtful fame distracts mankind below,
And nothing can we tell, and nothing know)
Without your aid, to count th' unnumber'd train,
A thousand mouths, a thousand tongues, were vain

Book V v 1

But Pallas now Tydides' soul inspires,
Itills with her force, and warms with all her fires;
Above the Greeks his deathless fame to raise,
And crown her hero with distinguish'd praise
High on his helm celestral lightnings play,
His beamy shield emits a living ray,

Th' un-

The unweared blaze meess ant streams supplies, Like the red star that fires the autumnal skies

But Pall's now Tydides soul inspires Fills with her rare, and warms with all her fires force.

O er all the Creeks deerees his fine to raise
Above the Creeks her narrors fame to raise his de athless

And crown her hero with immortal praise distin_nish d

Bright from his beamy crest the lightning phy, High on helm

From his broad bucklet fish d the living ray, High on his helm celestial lightnings play. His beamy shield emits a living ray. The Goldess with her breath the flame supplies Bright as the star who e lires in Autumn rise. Her breath divine thick streaming flame supplies Bright as the star who e lires in Autumn skies. The unversical blaze ince sunt streams supplies lake the red star that fires the autumnal skies.

When first he tears his redunit orb to sight, And bath d in Ocean, shoots a keener light Such glories Pall is on the chief bettow d, Such from his aims the ficric effulgence flow d Onward she drives him, furious to engage, Where the fight burns, and where the thickest rage

When fre h he rears he radiant orb the sight And gilds old Ocean with a blave of hight Bright as the star that fires the autumnal skies Fresh from the deep and gilds the seas and skies Such glorus Pallas on her chief bestow d Such spaiking rays from his bright armour flow d Such from his arms the firee effulgence flow d. Onward she drives him headlong to engage furious

Where the uar bleeds and where the fiercest rage fight burns, thickest

The

The sons of Dates first the combat sought, A wealthy prest, but neh without a fault, In Vulcan's fane the father's days were led, The sons to toils of glorious battle bred,

There ha'd a Trojan—Dares was his name, The priest of Vulcan, rich, yet void of blame, The sons of Dares first the combat sought, A wealthy priest, but rich without a fault

Conclusion of Book VIII v 687

As when the moon, refulgent lamp of night, O'er Heaven's clear azure spreads her sacred light, When not a breath disturbs the deep scienc, And not a cloud o'ercasts the solemn scene, Around her throne the vivid planets roll, And stars unnumber'd gild the glowing pole, O'er the dark trees a yellower verdure shed, And tip with silver every mountain's head, Then shine the vales, the rocks in prospect rise, A flood of glory buists from all the skies, The conscious swains, rejoicing in the sight, Eye the blue vault, and bless the useful light. So many flames before proud Ilion blaze, And lighten glimmering Xanthus with their rays, The long reflections of the distant fires Gleam on the walls, and tremble on the spires A thousand piles the dusky horrors gild, And shoot a shady lustre o'er the field Full fifty guards each flaming pile attend, Whose umber'd arms by fits thick flashes send, Loud neigh the course is o'er their lieaps of corn, And ardent warnors wart the rising morn.

As when in stillness of the silent night, As when the moon in all-her lustre bright,

As when the moon refulzent lamp of night O er Heaven's clear azure sheds her silver light; spreads sacred pure As still in air the trembling littre stood And o er its golden border shoots a flood When no loose gale disturbs the deep screne, not a breath

And no don cloud a creasts the olemn cent not a

Around her silver throne the planets glow And stars unnumber d trembling beams be tow Around her throne the vivid planets roll And stars unnumber d gild the glowing pol Clear gleams of light o er the dirk trees in scen

o or the dark trees 1 yellow sheds, Oer the dark trees a yellower green they shed

> Lleam verdure

And tip with silver all the mountain heads forest

And tip with after every mountain's head The valles open and the fore ts ri e The sale appear the rocks in prospect in e Then have the sales the ocks in prospect in e All nature tands reseald h for our eyes A flood of clary bursts from all the shies The conscious hepheid joyful at the sight Eyes the blue vault and numbers every light The con clous swains rejoicing at the sight shepherds gizing with delight Eye the blue vault and bles the raid hight clorious

useful So many flames before the navy blaze

proud Ilion And lighten glimmering Xanthus with their rays Wide o er the field to Troy extend the gleams And tip the distant spires with fainter beams The long reflections of the distant fires Gild the high walls and tremble on the spires Gleam on the walls and tremble on the spires,

A thousand fires at distant station, bright. Gild the dark prospect, and dispel the night

Of these specimens every man who has cultivated poetry, or who delights to trace the mind from the rudeness of its first conceptions to the elegance of its last, will naturally desire a greater number, but most other readers are already fired, and I am not writing only to poets and philosophers

The "Had" was published volume by volume, as the translation proceeded the four in t books appeared in 1715. The expectation of this work was undoubtedly high, and every man who had connected his name with criticism, or poetry, was desirous of such intelligence as might enable him to talk upon the popular topick. Hahifax, who, by having been first a poet, and then a patron of poetry, had acquired the right of being a judge, was willing to hear some books while they were yet unpublished. Of this rehearsal Pope afterwards gave the following account."

"The famous Lord Halifax was rather a pretender to taste, than really possessed of it. When I had finished the two or three first books of my translation of the "Iliad," that Lord desired to have the "pleasure of hearing them read at his house. Addison, Congreve, and Garth, were there at the reading. In four or five places, Lord Halifax stopt me very civily, and with a speech each time of much the same kind, 'I beg your pardon, Mr. Pope, but there is something in that passage that does not quite please me. Be so good as to mark

" the place, and consider it a little at your lessure "-I am sure you can give it a little turn -I re-" turned from Lord Hahfax's with Dr Gurth, in his "chariot, and, as we were going along, was saying to the Doctor, that my Lord laid laid me under a "great deal of difficulty by such loose and general " observations that I had been thinking over the " passages almost ever since, and could not guess at " what it was that offended his Lordship in either of "them Garth laughed heartily atmy embarrassment, " said I had not been long enough requainted with "Lord Halifax to know his way yet, that I need "(not puzzle myself about looking those places over "and over when I got home "All you need do " (says he) is to leave them just as they are call on "Lord Halifax two or three months hence, thank " him for his land observations on those passages. "and then read them to him as altered I have " known him much longer than you have, and will " be answerable for the event I followed his advice. " waited on Lord Halifax some time after a sud. I "hoped he would find his objections to those pra-" siges removed read them to him exactly as they "were at first and his Lordship was extremely "pleased with them, and cried out, "Ay, now they "are perfectly right nothing can be better

It is seldom that the great or the wise suspect that they are despised or cheated Halifax, thinking this a lucky opportunity of securing immortality, made some advances of favour and some overtures of advantage to Pope, which he seems to have received with sullen coldness 'All our knowledge of

of this transaction is derived from a single Letter (Dec. 1, 1714), in which Pope says, "I am obliged "to you, both for the favours you have done me, "and those you intend me. I distrust neither your "will not your memory, when it is to do good; "and if I ever become troublesome or solicitous, it "must not be out of expectation, but out of gratified. Your Lordship may cause me to live agreed ably in the town or contentedly in the country, which is really all the difference I set between an "easy fortune and a small one. It is indeed a high strain of generosity in you to think of making me "easy all my life, only because I have been so happy as to divert you some few hours but, if I may have leave to add it is because you think me no "enemy to my native country, there will appear a better reason; for I must of consequence be very "much (as I sincerely am) yours, &c."

These voluntary offers, and this faint acceptance, ended without effect. The patron was not accustomed to such frigid gratitude, and the poet fed his own pride with the dignity of independence. They probably were suspicious of each other. Pope would not dedicate till he saw at what rate his praise was valued, he would be "troublesome out of gratitude," not expectation." Halifax thought himself entitled to confidence, and would give nothing, unless he knew what he should receive. Their commerce had its beginning in hope of praise on one side, and of money on the other, and ended because Pope was less eager of money than Halifax of praise. It is not likely that Halifax had any personal benevolence.

to Pope, it is evident that Pope looked on Halifix with scorn and hatred

The reputation of this great work failed of gaining him a patron but it deprived him of a friend Addison and he were now at the head of poetry and criticism and both in such a state of elevation, that. like the two Rivals in the Roman state, one could no longer bear an equal, nor the other a superior Of the gradual abatement of kindness between friends, the beginning is often searcely discernible to them selves, and the process is continued by petty provoca tions, and incivilities sometimes peevishly returned, and sometimes contemptuously neglected, which would escape all attention but that of pride, and drop from any memory buffliat of resentment. That the quarrel of these two wits should be minutely deduced, is not to be expected from a writer to whom, as Homer says, "nothing but rumonr has reached, and " who has no personal knowledge

Pope doubtless approached Addison, when the reputation of their wit first brought them together, with the respect due to a min whose abilities were acknowledged, and who, having attuned that eminence to which he was himself aspring, had in his hands the distribution of literary fime. He paid court with sufficient diligence by his Prologue to "Cato by his abuse of Dennis, and with praise yet more direct, by his poem on the "Dialogues on Medals of which the immediate publication was then intended. In all this there was no hypocrisy for he confessed that he found in Addison something more pleasing than in any other min.

It may be supposed, that as Pope saw himself favoured by the world, and more frequently compared his own powers with those of others, his confidence increased, and his submission lessened, and that Addison felt no delight from the advances of a young wit, who might soon contend with him for the highest place. Every great man, of whatever kind be his greatness, has among his friends those who officiously or insidiously quicken his attention to offences, heighten his disgust, and stimulate his resentment. Of such adherents Addison doubtless had many, and Pope was now too high to be without them

From the emission and reception of the Proposals for the "Iliad," the kindness of Addison seems to have abated Jervas the painter once pleased himself (Aug 20, 1714) with imagining that he had re-established their friendship, and wrote to Pope that Addison once suspected him of too close a confederacy with Swift, but was now satisfied with his conduct To this Pope answered, a week after, that his engagements to Swift were such as his services in regard to the subscription demanded, and that the Tories never put him under the necessity of asking leave to "But," says he, "as M1 Addison be grateful "must be the judge in what regards himself, and " seems to have no very just one in regard to me, so "I must own to you I expect nothing but civility "from him" In the same letter he mentions Philips, as having been busy to kindle animosity between them, but in a Letter to Addison, he expresses some consciousness of behaviour, inattentively deficient in respect.

Of Swifts industry in promoting the subscription there remains the testimony of Kennet, no friend to either him or Pope

"Nov 2, 1713, Dr Swift came into the coffeehouse, and had a bow from every body but me, who, I confess, could not but despise him When I came to the anti-cliamber to wait, before privers, Dr Swift was the principal man of talk and business, and acted as master of request—Then he instructed a young nobleman that the best Pout
In England was Mr Pope (a papist), who had begun a translation of Homer into English verse, for which he must have them all subscribe for, says he, the author shall not begin to print till I have a thousand guiners for him

About this time it is likely that Steele, who was, with all his political fury, good natured and officious, procured an interview between the e angry ri vals, which ended in aggravated milevolence this occasion, if the reports be true, Pope made his eomplaint with frankness and spirit, as a nin undeservedly neglected or opposed and Addrson affected a contemptuous unconcern, and, in a calm even voice, reproached Pope with his vanity, and, tell ing him of the improvements which his early works had received from his own reinarks and those of Steele, said, that he, being now engaged in publicl business, had no longer any erre for his poetical reputation, nor had any other desire, with regard to Pope than that he should not, by too much arro gance, alienate the publick

To this Pope is said to have replied with giert keenness and severity, upbraiding Addison with per-Vol. M H netual petual dependance, and with the abuse of those qualifications which he had obtained at the publick cost, and charging him with mean endeavours to obstruct the progress of rising ment. The contest rose so high, that they parted at last without any interchange of civility

The first volume of "Homei" was (1715) in time published, and a rival version of the first Ihad for rivals the time of their appearance mevitably made them, was immediately printed, with the name of Tickell It was soon perceived that, among the followers of Addison, Tickell had the preference, and the criticks and poets divided into factions "I," says Pope, "have the town, that is, the mob, on "my side, but it is not uncommon for the smaller " party to supply by industry what it wants in num-"bers I appeal to the people as my rightful " judges, and while they are not inclined to condemn "me, shall not fear the high-flyers at Button's' This opposition he immediately imputed to Addison, and complained of it in terms sufficiently resentful to Craggs, their common friend

When Addison's opinion was asked, he declared the versions to be both good, but Tickell's the best that had ever been written, and sometimes said, that they were both good, but that Tickell had more of "Homer"

Pope was now sufficiently irritated, his reputation and his interest were at hazard. He once intended to print together the four versions of Dryden, Maynwaring, Pope, and Tickell, that they might be readily compared, and fairly estimated. This design seems

seems to have been defeated by the refusal of Tonson, who was the proprietor of the other three versions

Pope intended, at another time, a rigorous criticism of Tiel ells translation, and lind marked a copy, which I have seen, in all places that appeared defective. But, while he was thus meditating defence or revenge, his adversar, sunk before him without a blow the voice of the publick was not long divided, and the preference was universally given to Pope's performance.

He was convinced, by adding one circumstatice to mother, that the other translation was the worl of Addison himself but, if he knew it in Addison's life time, it does not appear that he told it. He left his illustrious antagonist to be punished by what has been considered as the most punful of all reflections, the remembrance of a crime perpetrated in vain.

The other circumstances of their quarrel were thus related by Pope *

"Philips scenned to livic been encouraged to abuse me in coffee houses, and conversations and Gil don wrote a fling about Wycherley, in which he had abused both me and my relations very grossly I ord Warwiel himself told me one day, that it was in vain for me to endeavour to be well with Mr Addison that his jealous temper would new are admit of a settled friendship between us and, to convince nic of what he had said, assured me, that Addson had encouraged Gildon to publish those candals, and had given him ten guineas

"after they were published. The next day, while I was heated with what I had heard, I wrote a letter to Mr. Addison, to let him know that I was not unacquainted with this behaviour of his; that, if I was to speak severely of him in return for it, it should be not in such a dirty way, that I should rather tell him, himself, fairly of his faults, and allow his good qualities, and that it should be something in the following manner: I then adjoined the first sketch of what has since been called my satile on Addison. Mr. Addison used me very civilly ever after."

The verses on Addison, when they were sent to Atterbury, were considered by him as the most excellent of Pope's performances, and the writer was advised, since he knew where his strength lay, not to suffer it to remain unemployed

This year (1715) being, by the subscription, enabled to live more by choice, having persuaded his father to sell their estate at Binfield, he purchased, I think only for his life, that house at Twickenham to which his residence afterwards procured so much celebration, and removed thither with his father and mother.

Here he planted the vines and the quincunx which his verses mention, and being under the necessity of making a subterianeous passage to a garden on the other side of the road, he adorned it with fossile bodies, and dignified it with the title of a grotto, a place of silence and retreat, from which he endea-

See, however, the Tafe of Addison in the Biographia Britannica, last edition. R

voured to persuade his friends and himself that eares and passions could be excluded

A grotto is not often the wish or pleasure of an Englishman, who has more frequent need to solicit than exclude the sun but Pope's excavation was requisite as an entrance to his gruden, and, as some men try to be proud of their defects, he extracted an ornament from an inconvenience, and vanity produced a grotto where necessity enforced a passage. It may be frequently remarked of the studious and speculative, that they are proud of trifles, and that their amusements seem frivolons and clinkish whether it be that men, conscious of great reputation, think themselves above the reach of censure, and safe in the admission of negligent indulgences, or that manking expect from clevated genus an uniformity of greatness, and watch its degradation with malicious wonder—high lim who, having followed with his eye an eagle into the clouds, should lament that she ever descended to a perch

While the volumes of his "Homer were annually published, he collected his fornier works (1717) into one quarto volume, to which he prefixed a Preface, written with great sprightliness and elegance, which was afterwards reprinted, with some passage, subjoined that he at first omitted other marginal additions of the same kind he made in the later editions of his poems. Waller remarks, that poets lose half their praise, because the reader knows not what they have blotted. Pope's voricity of fame taught him the art of obtaining the accumulated homour, both of what he had published, and of what he had suppressed.

In this year his father died suddenly, in his se venty-fifth year, having past twenty-nine years in privacy. He is not known but by the character which his son has given him. If the money with which he retired was all gotten by himself, he had traded very successfully in times when sudden riches were rarely attainable.

The publication of the "Iliad" was at last completed in 1720. The splendom and success of this work raised Pope many enemies, that endeavoured to depreciate his abilities. Burnet, who was afterwards a judge of no mean reputation, censured him in a piece called "Homerides' before it was published, Ducket likewise endeavoured to make him ridiculous. Dennis was the perpetual persecutor of all his studies. But, whoever his criticks were, their writings are lost; and the names which are preserved are preserved in the "Dunciad."

In this disastious year (1720) of national infatuation, when more riches than Peru can boast were expected from the South Sea, when the contagion of avarice tainted every mind, and even poets panted after wealth, Pope was seized with the universal passion, and ventured some of his money. The stock rose in its price, and for a while he thought himself the lord of thousands. But this dicam of happiness did not last long, and he seems to have waked soon enough to get clear with the loss of what he once thought himself to have won, and perhaps not wholly of that

Next year he published some select poems of his friend Dr Parnell, with a very elegant Dedication to the Earl of Oxford, who, after all his struggles and dangers,

dangers, then lived in retirement, still under the frown of a victorious faction, who could talk no pleasure in hearing his pruse

He gave the same year (1721) an edition of "Shikspeare" His name was now of so much authority, that Tonson thought himself entitled, by annexing it, to demand a subscription of six guiners for Shakspeares plays in six quarto volumes nor did his expectation much deceive him—for, of seven hundred and fifty which he printed, he dispersed a great number at the price proposed. The reputation of that edition, indeed, sunk afterwards so low, that one hundred and forty copies were sold at sixteen shillings each.

On this undertaking, to which Pope was induced by a reward of two hundred and seventeen pounds twelve shillings, he seems never to have reflected afterwards without vexation for Theobald, a man of heavy diligence, with very slender powers, first, in a bool called "Shak-peare Réstoied," and then in a formal edition, detected his deficiencies with all the insolence of victory and as he was now high enough to be feared and hated, Theobald had from others all the help that could be supplied, by the desire of humbling a haughty character

From this time Pope become an enemy to editor, collaters, commentators, and verbal criticks and hoped to persuade the world, that he miscarried in this undertaking only by having a nimd too great for such minute employment

Pope in his edition undoubtedly did many things wrong, and left many things undone but let him not be defrauded of his due praise. He was the first that knew, at least the first that told, by what helps the text might be improved. If he inspected the early editions negligently, he taught others to be more accurate. In his Preface, he expanded with great skill and elegance the character which had been given of Shakspeare by Dryden, and he drew the publick attention upon his works, which, though often mentioned, had been little read

Soon after the appearance of the "Iliad," resolving not to let the general kindness cool, he published proposals for a translation of the "Odyssey," in five volumes, for five guineas. He was willing, however, now to have associates in his labour, being either weary with toiling upon another's thoughts, or having heard, as Ruff'head relates, that Fenton and Broome had already begin the work, and liking better to have them confederates than rivals.

In the patent, instead of saying that he had "translated" the "Odyssey," as he had said of the "Ihad," he says, that he had "undertaken" a translation, and in the proposals, the subscription is said to be not solely for his own use, but for that of "two "of his friends who have assisted him in this work"

In 1723, while he was engaged in this new version, he appeared before the Lords at the memorable trial of Bishop Atterbury, with whom he had lived in great familiarity, and frequent correspondence. Atterbury had honestly recommended to him the study of the Popish controversy, in hope of his conversion, to which Pope answered in a manner that cannot much recommend his principles, or his judgement. In questions and projects of learning, they agreed better. He was called at the trial to give an account account of Atterbury's domestick life and private employment, that it might appear how little time he had left for plots Pope had but few words to utter, and in those few he made several blunders

His Letters to Atterbury express the utmost esteem, tenderness, and gratitude "perhaps, says he, "it "is not only in this world that I may have cause "to remember the Bishop of Rochester At their last interview in the Tower, Atterbury presented him with a Bible*

Of the "Odyssey" Pope translated only twelve books the rest were the worl of Broome and Tenton the notes were written wholly by Broome, who was not over-liberally rewarded. The publick was carefully kept ignorant of the several shares and an account was subjoined at the conclusion, which is now known not to be true

The first copy of Popes books, with those of Penton, are to be seen in the Museum. The parts of Pope are less interlined than the "Ihad" and the litter books of the "Ihad less thun the former. He giew dexterous by practice, and every sheet enabled him to write the next with more facility. The books of Penton have very few alterations by the hand of Pope. Those of Broome have not been found but Pope complained, as it is reported, that he had much trouble in correcting them.

His contract with Lintot was the same as for the "Iliad," except that only one hundred pounds were to be paid him for each volume. The number of ^{*} The late Mr Grives of Claverton informs us that this Bible was afterwards used in the Chapel of Prior Park Dr Warburton

p obably presented it to Mr Allen C

subscribers were five hundred and seventy-four, and of copies eight hundred and unneteen; so that his profit, when he had paid his assistants, was still very considerable. The work was finished in 1725, and from that time he resolved to make no more translations.

The sale did not answer Lintot's expectation, and he then pretended to discover something of fraud in Pope, and commenced or threatened a suit in Chancery.

On the English "Odyssey" a criticism was published by Spence, at that time Prejector of poetry at Oxford, a man whose learning was not very great, and whose mind was not very powerful. His criticism, however, was commonly just, what he thought, he thought rightly, and his remarks were recommended by his coolness and candour. In him Pope had the first experience of a critick without malevolence, who thought it as much his duty to display beauties as expose faults, who censured with respect, and praised with alacrity

With this criticism Pope was so little offended, that he sought the acquaintance of the writer, who lived with him from that time in great familiarity, attended him in his last hours, and compiled memorials of his conversation. The regard of Pope recommended him to the great and powerful, and he obtained very valuable preferments in the Church

Not long after, Pope was returning home from a visit in a friend's coach, which, in passing a bridge, was overturned into the water, the windows were closed, and being unable to force them open, he was in danger of immediate death, when the postillion snatched snatched him out by breaking the glass, of which the fragments cut two of his fingers in such a minner, that he lost their use

Voltaire, who was then in England, ent him a Letter of Consolation. He had been entertained by Pope at his table, where he talked with so much gio sness, that Mrs. Pope was driven from the room Pope discovered, by a trick, that he was a spy for the Court, and never considered him as a man worthy of confidence.

He soon afterwards (1727) joined with Swift, who was then in England, to publish three volumes of Miscellanie, in which, amongst other things, he inserted the ' Memoirs of a Parish Clerk, in ridicule of Burnets importance in his own History, and a " Debate upon Black and White Horses, written in all the formulaties of a legal process by the assistance, as is said, of Mr Portesche, afterwards Master of the Rolls Before these Miscellanies is a preface signed by Swift and Pope, but apparently written by Pope in which he makes a ridiculous and romantick complaint of the robberies committed upon authors by the clandestine seizure and sale of their papers He tells in tragicl strains, how " the cabinets of the Sick and the closets of the Dead have "been broken open and ransacked as if those violences were often committed for papers of uncertain and accidental value, which are rarely provoked by real treasures as if epigrims and essays were in danger where gold and diamonds are safe. A cat hunted for his must is according to Pope's account.

but the emblem of a wit winded by book sellers
His complaint, however, received some attestation for, the same year, the I etters written by him to

Mr. Cromwell in his youth, were sold by Mis. Thomas to Curll, who printed them

In these Miscellanies was first published the "Art "of Sinking in Poetry," which, by such a train of consequences as usually passes in literary quarrels, gave in a short time, according to Pope's account, occasion to the "Dunciad."

In the following year (1728) he began to put Atterbury's advice in practice, and shewed his satincal powers by publishing the "Dunciad," one of his greatest and most elaborate performances, in which he endeavoured to sink into contempt all the writers by whom he had been attacked, and some others whom he thought unable to defend themselves

At the head of the Dunces he placed poor Theo-bald, whom he accused of ingratitude, but whose real crime was supposed to be that of having revised "Shakspeare" more happily than himself. This satire had the effect which he intended, by blasting the characters which it touched. Ralph, who, unnecessarily interposing in the quarrel, got a place in a subsequent edition, complained that for a time he was in danger of starving, as the booksellers had no longer any confidence in his capacity.

The prevalence of this poem was gradual and slow; the plan, if not wholly new, was little understood by common readers. Many of the allusions required illustration, the names were often expressed only by the initial and final letters, and, if they had been printed at length, were such as few had known or recollected. The subject itself had nothing generally interesting, for whom did it concern to know that one or another scribbler was a dunce? If, therefore, it had been possible for those who were attacked to conceal their pain and their resentment, the "Dunciad might have made its way very slowly in the world

This, however, was not to be expected every man is of importance to himself, and therefore, in his own opinion, to others and, supposing the world already acquainted with all his pleasures and his pains, is perhaps the first to publish injuries or misfortunes, which had never been known unless related by himself, and at which those that hear them will only laugh for no man sympathises with the sorrows of vanity

The lustory of the "Dunciad is very minutely related by Pope hunself, in a Dedication which he wrote to Lord Middleser in the name of Savage

"I will relate the war of the 'Dunces (for so it has been commonly called), which began in the year 1727, and ended in 1730

"When Dr Swift and Mr Pope thought it pro"per, for reasons specified in the Preface to their
"Miscellanies, to publish such little pieces of theirs
"as had casually got abroad, there was added to "them the 'Treatise of the Bathos or the 'Art "of Sinking in Poetry It happened that, in one
"chapter of this piece, the several species of bad
"poets were ranged in classes, to which were pre"fixed almost all the letters of the alphabet (the "greatest part of them at random) but such was
"the number of poets eminent in that art, that some "one or other took every letter to lumself all fell into so violent a fury, that, for half a year or "more, the common newspapers (in most of which "they had some property, as being hired writers) were filled with the most abusive falsehoods and scurribites they could possibly devise, a liberty no way to be wondered at in those people, and in those papers, that, for many years during the uncontrouled licence of the piess, had aspersed almost all the great characters of the age; and this with impunity, then own persons and names being utterly secret and obscure "This gave Mr. Pope the thought, that he had

"This gave Mi. Pope the thought, that he had now some opportunity of doing good, by detecting and diagging into light these common enemies of mankind; since to invalidate this universal slander, it sufficed to shew what contemptible men were the authors of it. He was not without hopes that, by manifesting the dulness of those who had only malice to recommend them, either the booksellers would not find then account in employing them, or the men themselves, when discovered, want comage to proceed in so unlawful an occupation. This it was that gave buth to the 'Dunciad,' and he thought it an happiness, that, by the late flood of slander on himself, he had acquired such a peculiar right over their names as "was necessary to this design

"On the 12th of March, 1729, at St James's, "that poem was presented to the King and Queen "(who had before been pleased to read it) by the "right honourable Sir Robert Walpole: and, some days after, the whole impression was taken and dispersed by several noblemen and persons of the first distinction

"It is certainly a true observation, that no prople are so impatient of censure us those who are the greatest shanderers, which was wonderfully even a plified on this occasion. On the day the look was "first yended, a crowd of authors be used the shop a tricatics, advices threats of law and lattery, may be coming out of the a Domerid on the other side of the book ellers and lawkers made as great efforts to procure it. What could a few poor authors do against so great a majority as the public. There was no stopping a torrent with the finger so out "it came."

"Many Indicrous circumstances art inded it. The "Directs" (for by this name they were called) held "weel by clubs, to consult of hostilities against the "author one wrote i Letter to a great minister "assuring him Mr. Pops was the greatest enemy the "government land" and another bought his image "melay, to execute him in office, with which and "sort of satisfaction the gentlement were a little com" forted.

"Some file editions of the book living, an onl" in their fronti piece, the true one, to distinguish it, "fixed in his stead an ars liden with inthors. Then a mother surreptitions one being printed with the same ass, the new addition in octava returned for "distinct on to the owl again. Hence arose, a great contest of book-ellers against book-ellers, and advert cinemas against idvertisements. Some recom "mending the edition of the owl, and others the "edition of the ass, by which immes these time to " be distinguished, to the great honour also of the gentlemen of the Dunciad'."

Pope appears by this narrative to have contemplated his victory over the "Dunces" with great exultation; and such was his delight in the tumult which he had raised, that for a while his natural sensibility was suspended, and he read reproaches and invectives without emotion, considering them only as the necessary effects of that pain which he rejoiced in having given.

It cannot however be concealed that, by his own confession, he was the aggressor for nobody believes that the letters in the "Bathos" were placed at iandom; and it may be discovered that, when he thinks himself concealed, he indulges the common vanity of common men, and triumphs in those distinctions which he had affected to despise. He is provid that his book was presented to the King and Que'en by the right honourable Sir Robert Walpole, he is proud that they had read it before; he is proud that the edition was taken off by the nobility and persons of the first distinction.

The edition of which he speaks was, I believe, that which, by telling in the text the names, and in the notes the characters, of those whom he had satisfied, was made intelligible and diverting. The criticks had now declared their approbation of the plan, and the common reader began to like it without feat; those who were strangers to petty literature, and therefore unable to decipher initials and blanks, had now names and persons brought within their view, and delighted in the visible effect of those shafts of malice, which they had hitherto contemplated, as shot into the air.

Dennis

Dennis, upon the fresh provocation now given him, renewed the enmity which had for a time been appeased by mutual envilties and published remarks, which he had till then suppressed, upon the "Rape "of the Lock Many more grumbled in secret, or vented their resentment in the newspapers by epigrams or invectives

Ducket, indeed, being mentioned as loving Burnet with "pious passion, pretended that his moral character was injured, and for some time declared his resolution to take vengeance with a cudge! But Pope appeased him, by changing "pious passion to "cordial friendship and by a note, in which he beliemently disclaims the malignity of meaning imputed to the first expression

Aaron Hill, who was represented as diving for the prize, expostulated with Pope in a manner so much superior to all mean solicitation, that Pope was reduced to sneak and shuffle, sometimes to deny, and sometimes to apologize he first endeavours to wound, and is then afraid to own that he meant a blow

The "Duncind," in the complete edition, is addressed to Dr Swift of the notes, part were written by Dr Arbuthnot, and an apologetical Letter was prefixed, signed by Cleland, but supposed to have been written by Pope

After this general war upon Dulness, he seems to have indulged himself inhihe in tranquility but his subsequent productions prove that he was not idle. He published (1731) a poem on "Taste, in which he very particularly and severely criticises the house, the furnitine, the gardens, and the entertainments, Vol. XI of of Timon, a man of great wealth and little taste. By Timon he was universally supposed, and by the Earl of Burlington, to whom the poem is addressed, was privately said, to mean the Duke of Chandos; a man perhaps too much delighted with pomp and show, but of a temper kind and beneficent, and who had consequently the voice of the publick in his favour

A violent outcity was therefore raised against the ingratitude and treachery of Pope, who was said to have been indebted to the patronage of Chandos for a present of a thousand pounds, and who gained the opportunity of insulting him by the kindness of his invitation

The receipt of the thousand pounds Pope publickly denied, but, from the reproach which the attack on a character so annable brought upon him, he tried all means of escaping The name of Cleland was'again employed in an apology, by which no man was satisfied, and he was at last reduced to shelter his temerity behind dissimulation, and endeavour to make that disbelieved which he never had confidence openly to deny He wrote an exculpatory letter to the Duke, which was answered with great magnanimity, as by a man who accepted his excuse without believing his professions He said, that to have 11diculed his taste, or his buildings, had been an indifferent action in another man, but that in Pope, after the recipiocal kindness that had been exchanged between them, it had been less easily excused

Pope, in one of his Letters, complaining of the treatment which his poem had found, "owns that "such

" such enticl sean intimidate him, may almost per-" suide lim to write no more, which is a compli-" ment this age deserves " The man who threatens the world is always ridiculous for the world can easily go on without him, and in a short time will cease to miss him I have heard of an idiot, who used to revenge his vertions by lying all night upon the bridge "There is nothing, says Juvenal, "that a man will not believe in his own favour ' Pope had been firttered till lie thought limself one of the moving powers in the system of life When he talked of laying down his pen, those who sat round him intrented and implored and self love did not suffer him to suspect that they went away and laughed

The following year deprived him of Gay, a man whom he had I nown early, and whom he scemed to love with more tenderness than any other of his literary friends Pope was now forty four years old an age at which the mind begins less easily to admit new confidence and the will to grow less flexible and when, therefore, the departure of an old friend is very neutely felt

In the next year he lost his mother, not by an min expected death, for she had lasted to the age of ninety three but she did not die unhimented. The film piety of Pope was in the Ingliest degree annable and exemplary his parents had the happiness of living till he was at the summit of poetical reputation, till he was at ease in his fortune, and without a rival in his fame, and found no diminution of his re pect or tenderness Whatever was his pride, to them he was obedient and whatever was his irrita-12 bility.

bility, to them he was gentle. Life has, among its soothing and quiet comforts, few things better to give than such a son.

One of the passages of Pope's life, which seems to deserve some enquiry, was a publication of Letters between him and many of his friends, which falling into the hands of Cuill, a rapacious bookseller of no good fame, were by him printed and sold. This volume containing somé Letters from noblemen, Pope incited a prosecution against him in the House of Lords for a breach of privilege, and attended himself to stimulate the resentment of his friends. Curll appeared at the bar, and, knowing himself in no great danger, spoke of Pope with very little reverence: "He has," said Cuill, "a knack at versifying, but "in prose I think myself a match for him." When the orders of the House were examined, none of them appeared to have been infringed, Gurll went away triumphant; and Pope-was left to seek some other remedy.

Curll's account was, that one evening a man in a clergyman's gown, but with a lawyer's band, brought and offered to sale a number of printed volumes, which he found to be Pope's epistolary correspondence, that he asked no name, and was told none, but gave the price demanded, and thought himself authorised to use his purchase to his own advantage.

That Curll gave a true account of the transaction it is reasonable to believe, because no falsehood was ever detected; and when, some years afterwards, I mentioned it to Lintot, the son of Bernard, he declared his opinion to be, that Pope knew better than any body else how Curll obtained the copies, because another preel was at the same time sent to himself for which no price had ever been demanded, as he made known his resolution not to pay a porter, and consequently not to deal with a nameless agent

Such care had been taken to make them publick, that they were sent at once to two booksellers to Curll, who was likely to seize them as a prey, and to Lintot, who might be expected to give Pope information of the seeming injury. I intot, I believe, did nothing and Curll did what was expected. That to make them publick was the only purpose may be reasonably supposed, because the numbers, offered to sale by the private messengers, showed that hope of gain could not have been the motive of the impression.

It seems that Pope, being desirous of printing his Letters, and not knowing how to do, without imputation of vanity, what has in this country been done very rarely, contrived an appearance of compulsion that, when he could complain that his Letters were surreptitiously published, he might decently and defensively publish them himself

Pope's private correspondence, thus promulgated, filled the nation with praises of his candour, tenderness, and benevolence, the purity of his purposes, and the fidelity of his friendship. There were some Letters which a very good or a very wise man would wish suppressed but, as they had been already exposed, it was impracticable now to retract them.

From the perusal of those Letters, Mr. Allen first conceived the desire of knowing him; and with so much zeal did he cultivate the friendship which he had newly formed, that, when Pope told his purpose of vindicating his own property by a genuine edition, he offered to pay the cost.

This however Pope did not accept, but in time solicited a subscription for a Quarto volume, which appeared (1737), I believe, with sufficient profit. In the Preface he tells, that his Letters were reposited in a friend's library, said to be the Earl of Oxford's, and that the copy thence stolen was sent to the press. The story was doubtless received with different degrees of credit. It may be suspected that the Preface to the Miscellanies was written to prepare the publick for such an incident, and to strengthen this opinion, James Worsdale, a painter, who was employed in clandestine negotiations, but whose veracity was very doubtful, declared that he was the messenger who carried, by Pope's direction, the books to Cuill.

When they were thus published and avowed, as they had relation to recent facts, and persons either then living or not yet forgotten, they may be supposed to have found readers, but as the facts were minute, and the characters, being either private, or literary, were little known, or little regarded, they awakened no popular kindness or resentment, the book never became much the subject of conversation; some read it as a contemporary history, and some perhaps as a model of epistolary language, but those who read it did not talk of it. Not much therefore, was added by it to fame or envy, not do I remember that it produced either publick pruse, or publick censure

It had, however, in some degree, the recommendation of novelty Our language hid few Letters, except those of tatesmen Howel, indeed, about a century ago, jublished his Letters, which are commended by Morliofi, and which alone, of his hitindred volumes, continue his memory Loveday's Letters were printed only once those of Herbert and Suckling are lardly known Mrs Phillips's [Orindas] are equally neglected And those of Walsh seem written as exercises, and were never sent to any living mistress or hiend Popes epistolary excellence and an open field, he had no English rival living or dead

Pope is seen in this collection as connected with the other contemporary wits, and certainly sufficts no disgrace in the comparison—but it must be remembered, that he had the power of favouring himself, he might have origitally had publication in his mind, and have written with eare, or have afterwards se lected those which he had most happily conceived, or most diligently laboured—and I know not whether there does not appear something more studied and artificial* in his productions than the rest, except one long Letter by Bolingbroke, composed with the skill and industry of a professed author. It is indeed not easy to distinguish affectation from habit he that has once studiously formed a style rarely writes afterwards with complete ease. Pope may be said to write always with his reputation in his head; Swift, perhaps, like a man who remembered he was writing to Pope; but Arbuthnot, like one who lets thoughts drop from his pen as they rise into his mind.

^{*} The e letters were evidently prepared for the press by Pope him elf Some of the originals lately discovered will prove this beyond all dispute—in the edition of Pope's works littly pub It hed by Mr. Bowles C

Before these Letters appeared, he published the first part of what he persuaded himself to think a system of Ethicks, under the title of an "Essay on "Man," which, if his Letter to Swift (of Sept. 14, 1725,) be rightly explained by the commentator, had been eight years under his consideration, and of which he seems to have desired the success with great solicitude. He had now many open, and doubtless many secret enemies The "Dunces" were yet smarting with the war; and the superiority which he publickly airogated, disposed the world to wish his humiliation.

All this he knew, and against all this he provided. His own name, and that of his friend to whom the work is inscribed, were in the first editions carefully suppressed, and the poem, being of a new kind, was ascribed to one or another, as favour determined, or conjecture wandered; it was given, says Warburton, to every man, except him only who could write it. Those who like only when they like he author, and who are under the dominion of a name, condemned it, and those admired it who are willing to scatter praise at random, which while it is unappropriated excites no envy. Those friends of Pope, that were trusted with the secret, went about lavishing honours on the new-born poet, and hinting that Pope was never so much in danger from any former rival.

To those authors whom he had personally offended, and to those whose opinion the world considered as decisive, and whom he suspected of envy or malevolence,

levolence, he sent his Essay as a present before publication, that they might defeat their own country by praises, which they could not afterwards decently retract

With these precautions, 1733, was published the first part of the "Essay on Man I here had been for some time a report that Pope was busy upon a System of Morality but this design was not discovered in the new poem, which had a form and a title with which its readers were unacquainted. Its reception was not uniform, some thought it a very imperfect piece, though not without good lines. While the author was unknown, some, as will always happen, favoured him as an adventurer, and some censured him as an intruder but all thought him above neglect, the sale increased, and editions were multiplied.

The subsequent editions of the first Epistle exhibited two memorable corrections At fir t, the poet and his friend

Expatiate freely o er this scene of man, A mighty maze of walks authout a plan

For which he wrote afterwards,

A nighty maze, but not without a plan for if there were no plan, it were in vain to describe or to trace the maze

The other alteration was of these lines

And spite of pride, and in thy reason's spite One truth is clear, whatever is, is right

but

but having afterwards discovered, or been shewn, that the "truth" which subsisted "in spite of rea"son" could not be very "clear," he substituted

And spite of pride, in erring reason's spite.

To such oversights will the most vigorous mind be liable, when it is employed at once upon argument and poetry

The second and third Epistles were published; and Pope was, I believe, more and more suspected of writing them, at last, in 1734, he avowed the fourth, and claimed the honour of a moral poet.

In the conclusion it is sufficiently acknowledged, that the doctrine of the "Essay on Man" was received from Bolingbroke, who is said to have ridiculed Pope, among those who enjoyed his confidence, as having adopted and advanced principles of which he did not perceive the consequence, and as blindly propagating opinions contrary to his own That those communications had been consolidated into a scheme regularly drawn, and delivered to Pope, from whom it returned only transformed from prose to verse, has been reported, but can hardly be true. The Essay plainly appears the fabrick of a poet, what Bolingbroke supplied could be only the first principles, the order, illustration, and embellishments, must all be Pope's.

These principles it is not my business to clear from obscurity, dogmatism, or falsehood, but they were not immediately examined, philosophy and poetry have not often the same readers, and the Essay abounded in splendid amplifications and sparkling sentences, scutences, which were read and admired with no great attention to their ultimate purpose ats flowers caught the eye, which did not et what the gas foliage concealed, and for a time flourished in the sunshine of universal approbation Co little was any evil tendency discovered, that, is minocence is unsuspicious, many read it for a manual of picts

Its reputation soon invited a translator. It was first turned into French pro c, and afterwards by Resnel into verse Both translations fell into the hands of Crousaz, who first, when he had the ver sion in prose, wrote a general censure, and after wards reprinted Hesnel's version, with particular remarks upon every purigraph

Crousaz was a professor of Switzerland, comment for his treatise of Logicl , and his "Lyamen de Perrhonisme," and, however little known or regarded here, was no mean antagons t. His mind was one of those in which philosophy and piety are happily united. He was accustomed to argument and disquisition, and perhaps was grown too desirons of detecting faults but his intentions were ilways right, his opinions were solid and his religion pure

His meessant vialance for the promotion of picty disposed him to look with district upon all'inctaphy-sical systems of Theology, and all selicines of vir tue and happiness purely ritional, and therefore it was not long before he was persuaded that the positions of Pope, as they terminated for the most part in natural religion, were intended to draw mankind away from revelation, and to represent the whole course of things as a necessary concatenation of in dissoluble fitality, and it is undeniable, that in in my passages a religious eye may easily discover expressions not very favourable to morals, or to liberty.

About this time Warbuiton began to make his appearance in the first ranks of learning. He was a man of vigorous faculties, a mind fervid and vehiement, supplied by incessant and unlimited enquiry, with wonderful extent and variety of knowledge, which yet had not oppressed his imagination, nor clouded his perspicacity. To every work he brought a memory full fraught, together with a fancy fertile of original combinations, and at once exerted the powers of the scholar, the reasoner, and the wit. But his knowledge was too multifarious to be always exact, and his pursuits too eager to be always cautious His abilities gave him an haughty confidence, which he disdained to conceal or mollify, and his impatience of opposition disposed him to treat his adversaries with such contemptuous superiority as made his readers commonly his enemies, and excited ' against the advocate the wishes of some who favoured the cause. He seems to have adopted the Roman Emperor's determination, oder int dum metuant, he used no allurements of gentle language, but wished to compel rather than persuade.

His style is copious without selection, and forcible without neatness; he took the words that presented themselves, his diction is coarse and impure, and his sentences are unmeasured.

He had, in the early part of his life, pleased himself with the notice of inferior wits, and corresponded with the enemies of Pope. A Letter * was produced, when he had perhaps himself forgotten it, in which he tells Concanen "Dryden I observe bor"rows for wint of leisure, and Pope for want of "genius Milton out of pride, and Addison out of "modesty And when Pheobald published "Shak"speare, in opposition to Pope, the best notes were supplied by Warburton

^{*} This letter is in Mr Malone's Supplement to Shakspeare Vol I p 223 C

But the time was now come when Warburton was to change his opinion and Pope was to find a defender in him who had contributed so much to the evaluation of his rival

The arrogance of Wirburton excited against him every artifice of offence, and therefore it may be supposed that his union with Pope was censured as hypocritical inconstancy but surely to think differently, at different times, of poetical ment, may be easily allowed. Such opinions are often industrial, and dismissed, without nice examination. Who is there that has not found reason for changing his mind about questions of greater importance?

Warburton, whatever was his motive, undertook, without solicitation, to re one Pope from the talons of Crou 17, by freeing him from the imputation of favouring fitality, or rejecting revelation and from month to month continued a vindication of the "Issay on Man, in the hterary journal of that time called 'The Republick of I etters

Pope, who probably began to doubt the tendency of his own work, was glad that the positions, of which he percented himself not to how the full meaning could by any mode of interpretation be made to mean well. How much he was pleased with his gratuitous defender, the following Letter evidently shews:

"SIR, April 11, 1732.

"I have just received from Mr. R two more of "your Letters. It is in the greatest hung ima-"gmable that I write this, but I cannot help thank-"mg you in particular for your third Letter, which " 18 so extremely clear, short, and full, that I think " Mr. Crousaz ought never to have another answer, "and deserved not so good an one I can only say, "you do him too much honour, and me too much "right, so odd as the expression seems: for you " have made my system as clear as I ought to have "done, and could not It is indeed the same sys-"stem as mine, but illustrated with a ray of your "own, as they say our natural body is the same still "when it is glorified. I am sure I like it better than "I did before, and so will every man else. I know " I meant just what you explain, but I did not ex-" plain my own meaning so well as you You un-"derstand me as well as I do myself: but you ex-" press me better than I could express myself Pray, " accept the sincerest acknowledgements. I cannot " but wish these Letters were put together in one "Book, and intend (with your leave) to procure a "translation of part at least, or of all of them, into "French, but $\hat{\mathbf{I}}$ shall not proceed a step without "your consent and opinion, &c"

By this fond and eager acceptance of an exculpatory comment, Pope testified that whatever might be the seeming or real import of the principles which he had received from Bolingbroke, he had not intentionally attacked religion and Bolingbroke, if he meant to make him, without his own consent, in instrument of inischief, found him now engaged, with his eyes open, on the side of truth

It is known that Bolingbroke concealed from Popo his real opinions. He once discovered them to Mr. Hooke, who related them again to Pope, and was told by him that he must have mistaken the meaning of what he heard and Bolingbroke, when Pope's uneasiness meted him to desire an explanation, declared that Hooke had misunderstood him

Bolingbroke hated Warburton, who had drawn his pupil from him, and a little before Popes death they had a dispute, from which they parted with mutual aversion

From this time Pope lived in the closest intimacy with his commentator, and amply rewarded his kind ness and his zeal for he introduced him to Mr Murray, by whose interest he became preacher at Lincoln's line and to Mr Allen, who give him his niece and his estate, and by consequence a bishoprick. When he died, he left him the property of his works a legrey which may be reasonably estimated at four thousand pounds.

Popes fondness for the "Essay on Man appeared by his desire of its propagation Dobson, who had gained reputation by his version of Priors "Solo-"mon, was comployed by him to translat. It into Latin verse, and was for that purpose some time at Twickenham but he left his work, whitever was the reason, unfinished and, by Benson's invitation, undertool the longer task of "Paradise Lost' Pope then desired his friend to find a scholar who should turn his Essay into Latin prose; but no such performance has ever appeared

Popelived at this time among the Great, with that reception and respect to which his works entitled him, and which he had not impaired by any private misconduct or factious partiality. Though Boling-broke was his friend, Walpole was not his enemy; but treated him with so much consideration as, at his request, to solicit and obtain from the French Minister an abbey for Mr Southcot, whom he considered limiself as obliged to reward, by this exertion of his interest, for the benefit which he had received from his attendance in a long illness

It was said, that, when the Court was at Richmond, Queen Caroline had declared her intention to visit him. This may have been only a careless effusion, thought on no more the report of such notice, however, was soon in many mouths; and, if I do not forget or misapprehend Savage's account, Pope, pretending to decline what was not yet offered, left his house for a time, not, I suppose, for any other reason than lest he should be thought to stay at home in expectation of an honour which would not be conferred. He was therefore angry at Swift, who represents him as "refusing the visits of a "Queen," because he knew that what had never been offered had never been refused.

Beside the general system of morality, supposed to be contained in the "Essay on Man," it was his intention to write distinct poems upon the different duties or conditions of life, one of which is the Epistle to Loid Bathurst (1733) on the "Use of

" Riches,"

"Riches, a piece on which he declared great la bour to have been bestowed*

Into this poem some hints are historically thrown and some known characters are introduced, with others of which it is difficult to say how far they are real or fictitious but the pruse of Kyrl, the Mun of Ross, deserves particular examination, who, after a long and pompous enumeration of his publick. works and private charities, is said to have diffused all tho e blessings from five hundred a-year Won ders are willingly told, and willingly heard The tiuth is, that Kyrl was a man of known integrity and active benevolence by whose solicitation the wealthy were persuaded to prv contributions to his charitable schemes this influence he obtained by an example of liberality excited to the utmost extent of his power, and was thus enabled to give more than he had This account Mi Victor received from the mini ter of the place and I have preserved it, that the plaise of a good man, being made more eredible, may be more solid Nairations of romantick and impracticable virtue will be read with wonder, but that which is unattainable is recommended in vin that good may be endervoured, it must be shewn to be possible

This is the only piece in which the author has given a hint of his religion, by ridiculing the ceremony of burning the pope, and by mentioming with some indignation the inacription on the Monument

When this poem was first published, the dialogue, having no letters of direction, was perplexed and

Vol XI

* Spence K

obšcure

obscure Pope seems to have written with no very distinct idea for he calls that an "Epistle to "Bathurst," in which Bathurst is introduced as speaking

He afterwards (1734) inscribed to Lord Cobham his "Characters of Men," written with close attention to the operations of the mind and modifications of life. In this poem he has endeavoured to establish and exemplify his favourite theory of the ruling Passion, by which he means an original direction of desire to some particular object, an innate affection, which gives all action a determinate and invariable tendency, and operates upon the whole system of life, either openly, or more secretly by the intervention of some accidental or subordinate propension.

Of any passion, thus innate and irresistible, the existence may reasonably be doubted. Human characters are by no means constant; men change by change of place, of fortune, of acquaintance, he who is at one time a lover of pleasure, is at another a lover of money. Those indeed who attain any excellence, commonly spend life in one pursuit; for excellence is not often gained upon easier terms. But to the particular species of excellence men are directed, not by an ascendant planet or predominating humour, but by the first book which they read, some early conversation which they heard, or some accident which excited ardour and emulation.

It must at least be allowed that this ruling Passion, antecedent to reason and observation, must have an object independent on human contrivance, for there can be no natural desire of artificial good. No man therefore therefore can be born, in the strict acceptation, a lover of money, for he may be born where money does not exist nor can he be born, in a moral sense, a lover of his country for society, politically regulated, is a state contradistinguished from a state of nature and any attention to that coalition of interests which makes the happiness of a country, is possible only to those whom enquiry and reflection lave enabled to comprehend it

This doctrine is initiself permicious as well as false its tendency is to produce the belief of a kind of moral predestination, or over-ruling principle which cannot be resisted he that admits it is prepared to comply with every desire that caprice or opportunity shall exerte, and to flatter himself that he submits only to the lawful dominion of Nature, in obeying the resistless authority of his ruling Passion

Pope has formed his theory with so little skill, that, in the examples by which he illustrates and confirms it, he has confounded passions, appetites, and liabits

To the "Characters of Men he added soon after, in an Episfle supposed to have been addressed to Martha Blount, but which the last edition has taken from her the "Characters of Women" This poem, which was Inboured with great diligence, and in the author copinion with great success was neglected at its first publication, as the commentator supposes, because the public was informed, by an advertisement that it contained no character drawn from the Life an assertion which Pope probably did not expect nor wish to have been believed, and which he soon gave his readers sufficient leason to distrust, by telling them in a note that the work was imperfect, because part of his subject was Fice too high to be jet exposed

к 2

The time however soon came, in which it was safe to display the Dutchess of Marlborough under the name of Atossa, and her character was inserted with no great honour to the writer's gratitude.

He published from time to time (between 1730 and 1740) Imitations of different poems of Horace, generally with his name, and once, as was suspected, without it. What he was upon moral principles ashamed to own, he ought to have suppressed. Of these pieces it is useless to settle the dates, as they had seldom much relation to the times, and perhaps had been long in his hands.

This mode of imitation, in which the antients are familiarised, by adapting their sentiments to modern topicks, by making Horace say of Shakspeare what he originally said of Eimius, and accommodating his satties on Pantolabus and Nomentanus to the flatterers and produgals of our own time, was first practised in the reign of Charles the Second by Oldham and Rochester, at least I remember no instances more antient. It is a kind of middle composition between translation and original design, which pleases when the thoughts are unexpectedly applicable, and the parallels lucky. It seems to have been Pope's favourite amusement, for he has carried it farther than any former poet.

He published likewise a revival, in smoother numbers, of Di Donne's Satnes, which was recommended to him by the Duke of Shrewsbury and the

Earl of Oxford They made no great impression on the publick Pope seems to have known their imbeeility, and therefore suppressed them while he was yet contending to rise in reputation, but ventured them when he thought their deficiencies more likely to be imputed to Donne than to himself

The Epistle to Dr Arbntlinot, which seems to be derived in its first design from Boileiu's Address a son Esprit, was published in Jimiri 1735, about a month before the death of him to whom it is in scribed. It is to be regretted, that either honour or pleasure should have been missed by Arbntlinot a man estimable for his learning, annible for his life, and venerable for his piets.

Arbuthnot was a man of great comprehension, skilful in his profession, versed in the sciences, acquainted with antient literature, and able to animate his mass of knowledge by a bright and active mingination a scholar with great brilliance of wit a wit, who, in the crowd of life, retained and discovered a noble ardour of religious zeal

In this poem Pope seems to reckon with the publiek. He vindicates himself from censures, and with digmity, rather than arrogance, enforces his own claims to kindness and respect

Into this poem are interwoven several paragraphs which had been before printed a a fragment and among them the satureal lines upon Addison, of which the last couplet has been to icc corrected. It was at first,

Who would not smile if such a man there be 3

Who would not laugh if Addison were he?

Then,

Who would not grieve if such a man there be? Who would not laugh if Addison were he?

At last it is,

Who but must laugh if such a man there be?
Who would not weep if Atticus were he?

He was at this time at open war with Lord Hervey, who had distinguished himself as a steady adherent to the Ministry; and, being offended with a contemptuous answer to one of his pamphlets, had summoned Pulteney to a duel Whether he or Pope made the first attack, perhaps, cannot now be easily known he had written an invective against Pope, whom he calls, "Hard as thy heart, and as thy "birth obscure," and hints that his father was a hatter. To this Pope wrote a reply in verse and prose, the verses are in this poem, and the prose, though it was never sent, is printed among his Letters, but to a cool reader of the present time exhibits nothing but tedious malignity.

His last Satires, of the general kind, were two Dialogues, named, from the year in which they were published, "Seventeen Hundred and Thirty-eight" In these poems many are praised, and many reproached. Pope was then entangled in the opposition; a follower of the Prince of Wales, who dired at his house, and the friend of many who obstructed and censured the conduct of the Ministers. His political

^{*} Intituled, "Sedition and Defamation displayed," 8vo 1733 $\,$ R

[†] Among many MSS letters, &c relating to Pope which I have lately seen, is a lampoon in the Bible -tyle, of much humour, but inseverent, in which Pope is richeuled as the son of a hatter C

I hat

partiality was too plainly shown the forgot the prodence with which he pasted, in his carly years, in injured and unoffending, through much more vinlent conflicts of faction

In the first Dralogue, having an opportunity of prusing Allen of Hath, he asked his leave to mention him as a man not illustrious by any merit of his ancestors, and called him in his verses "low born "Allen' Men are addone satisfied with praise in troduced or followed by any mention of defect Allen seems not to have taken any pleasure in his epithet, which was afterwards saftened. Into "humble "Allen"

In the second Dialogue he took some liberty with one of the Loves, among others which Lox, in a reply to Lyttelton, took an opportunity of repriving, by reproaching him with the friend hip of a lain pooner, who cattered his ink without fear or deceney, and against whom he hoped the resentment of the Legislature would quickly be discharged.

About this time Paul Whitehead, a small poet,

About this time Paul Whitchead, a small poet, was summoned before the Lords for a poem called "Manners," together with Dodsley his publisher Whitchead, who hung loose upon society, sculked and escaped but Dodsley a shop and family made his appearance necessary. He was, however, soon dismissed, and the whole process was probably in tended rather to intimidate Pope, than to punish Whitchead.

Pope never afterwards attempted to join the patriot with the poet, nor drew his pen upon statesmen

^{*} On a hint from Warb inton. There is however realon to think from the appearance of the house in which Allen was born at Saint Blade that he was not of a low but of a decayed family C

That he desisted from his attempts of reformation is imputed, by his commentator, to his despair of prevailing over the corruption of the time. He was not likely to have been ever of opinion, that the dread of his sature would countervail the love of power or of money, he pleased himself with being important and formidable, and gratified sometimes his pride, and sometimes his resentment. till at last he began to think he should be more safe, if he were less busy.

The "Memoirs of Scribleins," published about this time, extend only to the first book of a work projected in concert by Pope, Swift, and Arbuthnot, who used to meet in the time of Queen Anne, and denominated themselves the "Scribleins Club." Their purpose was to censure the abuses of learning by a fictitious Life of an infatuated Scholar. They were 'dispersed, the design was never completed; and Warburton laments its miscarriage, as an event very disastrous to polite letters

If the whole may be estimated by this specimen, which seems to be the production of Arbuthnot, with a few touches perhaps by Pope, the want of more will not be much lamented, for the follies which the writer ridicules are so little practised, that they are not known, nor can the satire be understood but by the learned he raises pliantoms of absurdity, and then drives them away. He cures diseases that were never felt

For this reason this joint production of three great writers has never obtained any notice from mankind, it has been little read, or when read has been forgotten, as no man could be wiser, better, or merrier, by remembering it.

The

The design cannot boast of much originality for, besides its general resemblance to Don Quivote, there will be found in it particular mutations of the History of Mr. Ouffle

Swift earried so much of it into Irichard assupplied him with limits for his travels, and with those the world might have been contented, though the rest had been suppressed

Populard ought for minger and centiments in a region not known to live been explored by many other of the Inglish writers he had consulted the modern writers of Latin Poetry a class of authors whom Boilean endervoured to bring into contimpt, and who are too generally neglected Pope, how ever, was no ashumed of their requirentance, nor ungrateful for the advantages which he might have derived from it A small selection from the Italians. who wrote in Latin, had been published at London, about the latter end of the last century, by a man ? who concealed his name, but whom his Prefree, howe to have been well qualified for his midertal in, I his collection Pope amplified by more than half, and (1740) published it in two volumes, but injuriously omitted his predecesor's prefice. To the c books which had nothing but the mere text, no regard was paid the authors were still neglected, and th editor was neither praised nor rensured

He did not surk into idle in the hird planned a prock, which he considered a subsequent to his "Lessy on Man, of which he has given this account to Dr. Swift ^{*} Since di covered to have been Alterbury, afterwards Bi hop of Rochester—See the Collection of that Piel to a Lip tolary force pontence sol IV p. 6.

" March 25, 1736.

"If ever I write any more Epistles in verse, one " of them shall be addressed to you I have long "concerted it, and begun it; but I would make " what bears your name as finished as my last work " ought to be, that is to say, more finished than any " of the rest The subject is large, and will divide " into four Epistles, which naturally follow the 'Es-" say on Man,' viz 1. Of the Extent and Limits of "human Reason and Science 2 A View of the " useful and therefore attainable, and of the unuseful "and therefore unattainable, Aits 3. Of the Na-"ture, Ends, Application, and Use, of different "Capacities 4. Of the Use of Learning, of the "Science of the World, and of Wit It will con-" clude with a satire against the Misapplication of all "these, exemplified by Pictures, Characters, and " Examples

This work in its full extent, being now afflicted with an asthma, and finding the powers of life gradually declining, he had no longer courage to undertake, but, from the materials which he had provided, he added, at Warburton's request, another book to the "Dunciad," of which the design is to ridicule such studies as are either hopeless or useless, as either pursue what is unattainable, or what, if it be attained, is of no use.

When this book was printed (1742) the laurel had been for some time upon the head of Cibber, a man whom it cannot be supposed that Pope could regard with much kindness or esteem, though in one of the imitations of Horace he has liberally enough praised the "Careless Husband" In the "Dunciad," among other worthless scribblers, he had mentioned Cibber who, in his "Apology, complains of the great Poet's unkindness as more injurious, "because," says he, "I never have offended him

It might have been expected that Pope should have been, in some degree, mollified by this submissive gentleness, but no such con equence appeared. Though he condescended to commend Cibber once, he mentioned him afterwards contemptiously in one of his satires, and again in his Epistle to Arbuthnot and in the fourth book of the "Duneral attacked him with aerimony, to which the provocation is not easily discoverable. Perhaps he imagined that, in indiculing the Laureat, he satirized those by whom the laurel had been given, and gritified that ambitious petulence with which he affected to insult the great.

The severity of this satire left Cibber no longer any patience. He had confidence enough in his own powers to believe that he could disturb the quict of his adversary, and doubtless did not want institutors, who without any care about the victory, desired to amuse themselves by looking on the contest. He therefore gave the town a painplilet, in which he declares his resolution from that time never to bear another blow without returning it, and to the out his adversary by perseverance, if he cannot conque: him by strength

The incessant and unappeasable malignity of Pope he imputes to a very distant cause. After the Three Hours after Mariage, had been driven off the stage, by the offence which the muining and crocodile gave the audience, while the exploded

scane

Cibber played Bayes in the Rehearsal, and, as it had been usual to enliven the part by the mention of any recent theatrical transactions, he said, that he once thought to have introduced his lovers disguised in a Mummy and a Crocodile "This," says he, "was received with loud claps, which indicated contempt of the play" Pope, who was behind the scenes, meeting him as he left the stage, attacked him, as he says, with all the virulence of a "Wit" out of his senses," to which he replied, "that he would take no other notice of what was said by so "particular a man, than to declare, that, as often "as he played that part, he would repeat the same "provocation"

He shews his opinion to be, that Pope was one of the authors of the play which he so zealously defended; and adds an idle story of Pope's behaviour at a tayern.

The pamphlet was written with little power of thought or language, and, if suffered to remain without notice, would have been very soon forgotten. Pope had now been enough acquainted with human life to know, if his passion had not been too powerful for his understanding, that from a contention like his with Cibber, the world seeks nothing but, diversion, which is given at the expense of the higher character. When Cibber lampooned Pope, curiosity was excited, what Pope would say of Cibber nobody enquired, but in hope that Pope's asperity might betray his pain and lessen his dignity.

He should therefore have suffered the pamphlet to flutter and die, without confessing that it stung him;

The

The dishonour of being sliewn as Cibber's antagonist could never be compensated by the victory. Cibber had nothing to lose when Pope had exhausted all his malignity upon him, he would use in the esteem both of his friends and his enemies. Silence only could have made him despicable, the blow which did not appear to be felt would have been struck in vain

But Popes trascibility prevailed, and he resolved to tell the whole English world that he was at war with Cibber and, to shew that he thought him no common adversary, he prepared no common vengeance he published a new edition of the "Dungeance he published a new edition of the "Dungeance" in which he degraded Theobald from his painful pre eminence, and enthroned Cibber in his stead. Unhappily the two heroes were of opposite characters, and Pope was unwilling to lose what he haid already written he has therefore deprayed his poem by giving to Cibber the old books, the old pedantry, and the sluggish pertinaeity of Theobald

Pope was ignorant enough of his own interest, to make another change, and introduced Osborne contending for the prize among the booksellers. Osborne was a man entirely destitute of shame, without sense of any disgrace but that of poverty. He told me, when he was doing that which raised Popes resentment, that he should be put into the "Duneiad, but he had the fite of "Cassandra. I give no credit to his prediction, till in time I saw it accomplished. The shifts of satire were directed equally in vain against Cibber and Osborne. being repelled by the impenetrable impudence of one and deidened by the impenetrable impudence of one and deidened by the impassive dulness of the other.

fessed his own pain by his anger, but he gave no pain to those who had provoked him. He was able to hurt none but himself, by transferring the same ridicule from one to another, he reduced himself to the insignificance of his own magpie, who from his cage calls cuckold at a venture.

Cibber, according to his engagement, repaid the "Dunciad" with another pamphlet", which, Pope said, "would be as good as a dose of hartshorn to "him," but his tongue and his heart were at variance. I have heard Mr. Richardson relate, that he attended his father the painter on a visit, when one of Cibber's pamphlets came into the hands of Pope, who said, "These things are my diversion." They sat by him while he perused it, and saw his features writhing with anguish, and young Richardson said to his father when they returned, that he hoped to be preserved from such diversion as had been that day the lot of Pope

From this time, finding his diseases more oppressive, and his vital powers gradually declining, he no longer strained his faculties with any original composition, nor proposed any other employment for his remaining life than the revisal and correction of his former works, in which he received advice and assistance from Warburton, whom he appears to have trusted and honoured in the highest degree.

He laid aside his Epick Poem, perhaps without much loss to mankind; for his hero was Brutus the Trojan, who, according to a ridiculous fiction, established a colony in Britain. The subject therefore was of the fabulous age, the actors were a race upon whom imagination had been exhausted, and attention wearied, and to whom the mind will not easily be recalled, when it is invited in blank verse, which Pope had adopted with great impridence, and I think, without due con ideration of the nature of our language. The sketch is, at least in part, preserved by Ruffhead, by which it appears, that Pope was thoughtless enough to model the immes of his heroes with terminations not consistent with the time or country in which he places them.

He had for at least five very been afflicted with an asthma, and other di orders, which his physicians were unable to relieve. Lowards the end of his higher consulted Dr. Homson, a man who had, by large promes, and free censures of the common practice of physic), forced himself up into sudden reputation. Thom on declared his discounter to be a dropsy, and even acted part of the water by uncture of plays but confessed that his bells did not sub-def. Thomson had many enemies, and Pope was persuaded to dismiss him.

While he was yet o puble of amusement and conversation as he was one day atting in the air with Lord Boling broke and Lord Marchiniont he saw his favourite Martha Blount it the bottom of the terrice, and asked Lord Boling broke to go and hand her up Bolingbrole, not hing, his creand crossed his legs and at still but Lord Marchiniont who was younger and he s captions, waited on the lada, who, when he came to her, asked, "What, is he not "dead yet. She is said to have in bleeted him, with shaimeful unkindness, in the latter time of his decay; yet, of the little which he had to leave she had a very great part. Their acquaintance began early; the life of each was pictured on the other's mind, their conversation therefore was endearing, for when they met, there was an immediate coalition of congenial notions. Perhaps he considered her unwillingness to approach the chamber of sickness as female weakness, or human frailty; perhaps he was conscious to himself of peevishness and impatience, or, though he was offended by her inattention, might yet consider her ment as overbalancing her fault; and, if he had suffered his heart to be alienated from her, he could have found nothing that might fill her place, he could have only shrunk within himself, it was too late to transfer his confidence or fondness

In May, 1744, his death was approaching*, on the sixth, he was all day delinious, which he mentioned four days afterwards as a sufficient humiliation of the vanity of man, he afterwards complained of seeing things as through a curtain, and in false colours, and one day, in the presence of Dodsley, asked what arm it was that came out from the wall. He said that his greatest inconvenience was inability to think.

Bolingbroke sometimes wept over him in this state of helpless decay, and being told by Spence, that Pope, at the intermission of his delinousness, was always saying something kind either of his present or absent friends, and that his humanity seemed to have survived his understanding, answered, "It has so" And added, "I never in my life knew a man that "had so tender a heart for his particular friends, or more general friendship for mankind." At another time he sud, "I have I nown Pope'these thirty years, "and value" myself more in his friendship than — His grief then suppressed his voice."

Pope expressed indoubting conflictibe of a future state. Being isked by his friend Mi. Hooke, a papist, whether he would not die like his fither and mother, and whether a priest should not be called he an swered, "I do not think it is e tentral, but it will be "very right, and I think you for justing me in "mind of it."

In the morning, after the priest had given limit the last sacraments, he said, "There is nothing that is "mentorious but virtue and faiend-lip, and indeed "friendship itself is only a part of virtue."

He died in the evening of the thirtleth day of May, 1744, so plicidly that the attendants did not discern the exect time of his expiration. He was birried at I wiskenham, near his father and mother, where a monument has been erected to him by his commentator, the Bishop of Gloncester.

He left the ene of lust pipers to his executors first to Lord Bolingbrol e*; and, if he should not be living to the Eul of Machiniont undoubtedly expecting them to be proud of the trust, and enger to extend his fine—But let no min dream of influence beyond his life. After a decent time, Dodsley the bookseller went to solicit pix fercice as the publisher, and was told that the parcel had not been yet inspected and, whitever was the reason, the world has been disappointed of what was "reserved for the next age."

^{*} The is onewhat inaccurately expressed. Ford Bolingbroke we not an executor. Fores papers were left to him pecifically or in eac of his death to Ford Marchmont.

He lost, indeed, the favour of Bolingbroke by a kind of posthumous offence. The political pamphlet called "The Patriot King" had been put into his hands that he might procure the impression of a very few copies, to be distributed, according to the author's direction, among his friends, and Pope assured him that no more had been printed than were allowed, but, soon after his death, the printer brought and resigned a complete edition of fifteen hundred copies, which Pope had ordered him to print, and retain in secret He kept, as was observed, his engagement to Pope, better than Pope had kept it to his friend; and nothing was known of the transaction, till, upon the death of his employer, he thought himself obliged to deliver the books to the right owner, who, with great indignation, made a fire in his yard, and delivered the whole impression to the flames.

Hitherto nothing had been done which was not naturally dictated by resentment of violated faith: resentment more acrimonious, as the violator had been more loved or more trusted. But here the anger might have stopped, the injury was private, and there was little danger from the example.

Bolingbroke, however, was not yet satisfied; his thirst of vengeance excited him to blast the memory of the man over whom he had wept in his last struggles, and he employed Mallet, another friend of Pope, to tell the tale to the publick with all its aggravations. Warburton, whose heart was warm with his legacy, and tender by the recent separation, thought it proper for him to interpose; and undertook, not indeed to vindicate the action, for breach of trust has always something criminal, but to extend nuate it by an apology. Having advanced what cannot be denied, that moral obliquity is made more or less excusable by the motives that produce it, he enquires what evil purpose could have induced Pope to break his promise. He could not delight his vanity by usurping the work, which, though not sold in shops, had been shewn to a number more than sufficient to preserve the authors claim. he could not gratify his avariee, for he could not sell his plander till Bolingbroke was dead, and even then, if the copy was left to another, his fraud would be defeated, and if left to himself would be useless.

Warburton therefore supposes, with great appearance of reason, that the irregularity of his conduct proceeded wholly from his zeal for Bolingbroke, who might perhaps have destroyed the pamphlet, which Pope thought it his duty to preserve, even without its authors approbation. Fo this apology an answer was written in "A Letter to the most impudent "Man living

He brought some reproach upon his own memory by the petulant and contemptuous mention made in his will of Mr Allen, and an affected repayment of his benefactions. Mrs Bloant, as the known friend and fayourite of Pope, had been invited to the house of Allen, where she comported herself with such indecent arrogance, that she parted from Mrs Allen in a state of in reconcilcable dishike, and the door was for ever buried against her. This exclusion she resented with a much bitterness as to refuse any legacy from Pope, unless he left the world with a disarowal of obligation to Allen. Having been long under her dominion, now tottering in the decline of life, and unable to resist the wiolence of her temper, or perhaps, with the prejudice of a lover, persuaded that she had suffered improper treatment, he complied with her demand, and polluted his will with female resentment. Allen accepted the legacy, which he gave to the hospital at Bath, observing that Pope was always a bad accomptant, and that, if to 1501 he had put a cipher more, he had come nearer to the truth.

L 2

' This account of the difference between Pope and Mr Allen is not so encounstantial as it was in Johnson's power to have made it. The particulars communicated to him concerning it he was too indolent to commit to writing, the business of this note is to supply his omissions.

Upon an invitation in which Mis Blount was included, Mr Pope made i visit to Mi Mlen at Priorspark, and having occasion to go to Bristol for a few days, left Mis Blount behind him. In his absence Mis Blount, who was of the Romish persussion, signified in inclination to go to the Popish chapel at Bith, and desired of Mr Allen the use of his chariot for the purpose, but he being at that time major of the city, suggested the impropried of having his carriage seen at the door of a place of worship, to which as a magistrate he was at least restrained from giving a sanction, and night be required to suppress, and therefore desired to be excused. Mis Blount resented this refusal, and told Pope of it at his return, and so infected him with her rige that they both left the house abrubtly f

An instance of the like negligence may be noted in his relation of Pope's love of painting, which differs much from the information I gave him on that head. A picture of Betterton, cert mily copied from Kneller by Pope ‡, Lord Mansfield once shewed me at Kenwood-house, adding, that it was the only one he ever finished, for that the werkness of his eyes was an obstruction to his use of the pencil. H

[†] This is altogether wrong Pope kept up his friend hip with Mr Allen to the last, as appears by his letters, and Mrs Blount remained in Mr Allen's house some time after the coolness took place between lerind Mrs Allen Allen's conversation with Pope on this subject, and his letters to Mrs Blount, all whose quarrels he was obliged to share, will appear in Mr Bowles's edition of Pope's Works now in the press. C

FHL person of Pope is well known not to larve been formed by the meest model. He has, in his account of the "Little Club, compared himself to a spider, and by another is described as protuberant behind and before. He is said to have been beautiful in his infancy but he was of a constitution originally feeble and weak, and, as bodies of a tender frame are easily distorted, his deformity was probably in part the effect of his application. His stature was so low, that, to bring him to a level with common tables, it was necessary to raise his seat. But his face was not displeasing, and his eyes were animated and vivid.

By natural deformity, or accidental distortion, his vital functions were so much disordered, that his life was a "long disease. His most frequent assailment was the headach, which he used to reheve by inhaling the steam of coffee, which he very frequently required.

Most of what can be told concerning his petty peculiarities was communicated by a famile domesticl of the Earl of Oxford, who I new him perhaps after the middle of life. He was then so weak as o stand in perpetual need of female attendance extremely sensible of cold, so that he wore a kind of fur doublet, under a shirt of a very coarse warm linen with fine sleeves. When he rose, he was invested in boddice made of stifl canvas, being searcely able to hold himself erect till they were laced, and he then put on a flannel waistcoat. One side was contracted. His legs werelso slender, that he enlarged their bulk with three pair of stockings, which were drawn on and off by the maid, for he was not able to dress or undress himself, and neither went to bed not rose without help. His weakness made it very difficult for him to be clean

His hair had fallen almost all away; and he used to dine sometimes with Lord Oxford, privately, in a velvet cap. His dress of ccremony was black, with a tie-wig, and a little sword.

The indulgence and accommodation which his sickness required, had taught him all the unpleasing and unsocial qualities of a valetudinary man. He expected that every thing should give way to his ease or humour, as a child, whose parents will not hear her cry, has an unresisted dominion in the nursery

C'est que l'enfant toûjours est homme, C'est que l'homme est toûjours enfant.

When he wanted to sleep he "nodded in company;" and once slumbered at his own table while the Prince of Wales was talking of poetry.

The reputation which his friendship gave procured him many invitations, but he was a very trouble-some inmate. He brought no servant, and had so many wants, that a numerous attendance was scarcely able to supply them. Wherever he was, he left no room for another, because he exacted the attention, and employed the activity, of the whole family. His errands were so frequent and frivolous, that the footmen in time avoided and neglected him, and the Earl of Oxford discharged some of the servants for their resolute refusal of his messages. The maids, when they had neglected their business, alleged that they

they had been employed by Mr Pope One of his constant demands was of coffee in the night, and to the woman that waited on him in his chamber he was very burthensome but he was careful to recompense her want of sleep and Lord Oxford's servant declared, that in the house where her business was to answer his call, she would not ask for wages

He had another fault, easily meident to those who, suffering much pain, think themselves entitled to whatever pleasures they can snatch. He was too indulgent to his appetite he loved meat highly seasoned and of strong taste and, at the intervals of the table, amused himself with biscuits and dry conserves he sat down to a variety of dislies, lie would oppress his stomach with repletion, and though he seemed angry when a dram was offered him, did not forbear to drink it His friends, who knew the avenues to his heart, pampered him with presents of luxury, which he did not suffer to stand neglected The death of great men is not always proportioned to the lustre of their lives Hannibal, says Juvenal, did not perish by the javelin or the sword the slaughters of Cannæ were revenged by a ring The death of Pope was imputed by some of his friends to a silver saucepan, in which it was his delight to heat potted lampreys

That he loved too well to eat, is certain but that his sensuality shortened his life will not be histily concluded, when it is remembered that a conformation so irregular lasted six and fifty years, notwithstanding such pertinacious diligence of study and meditation

In all his intercourse with mankind, he had great delight in artifice, and endeavoured to attain all his purposes by inducet and unsuspected methods "He hardly drank tea without a stratageni." If, at the house of his friends, he wanted any accommodation, he was not willing to ask for it in plain terms, but would mention it remotely as something convenient; though, when it was produced, he soon made it appear for whose sake it had been recommended. Thus he terzed Lord Orrery till he obtained a screen. He practised his aits on such small occasions, that Lady Bolingbroke used to say, in a French phrase, that "he played the politician about cabbages and tin-" mps." His unjustifiable impression of the "Patriot "King," as it can be imputed to no particular motive, must have proceeded from his general liabit of secrecy and cunning, he caught an opportunity of a sly trick, and pleased himself with the thought of outwitting Bolingbioke.

In familiar or convivial conversation, it does not appear that he excelled. He may be said to have resembled Diyden, as being not one that was distinguished by vivacity in company. It is remarkable, that so near his time, so much should be known of what he has written, and so little of what he has said traditional memory retains no sallies of raillery, nor sentences of observation, nothing either pointed or solid, either wise or merry. One apophthegm only stands upon record. When an objection, raised against his inscription for Shakspeare, was defended by the authority of "Patrick," he replied "hor-" resco referens"—that "he would allow the pub"lisher of a Dictionary to know the meaning of a single word, but not of two words put together

He was fictful and easily displeted and allowed himself to be expressorsly resentful. He would some times leave I and Oxford silently no one could tell why, and was to be courted back by more letters and messages than the footness were willing to earry. The table was indeed infested by Lady Mary Wortler, who was the friend of Lady Oxford and who, I nowing his previshness, could by no intrestics be restrained from contradicting him, till their disputes were sharpened to such asperity, that one or the other quitted the house

He sometimes condescended to be jocular with servants or inferiors, but by no merrunent, either of others or his own, was he ever seen excited to lughter

Of his domestick character, flugality was a part eminently remarkable. Having determined not to be dependent, he determined not to be in whit, and thereforewisely and magnatimously rejected all temptations to expence ausuitable to his fortune. This general care must be universally approved but it sometimes appeared in petty attrices of par miony, such as the practice of writing his compositions on the back of letters, as may be seen in the remaining copy of the "Hiad, by which perhaps in five years five shillings were saved or in a niggardly reception of his friends, and sentitions of cutertuminent, as, when he had two guests in his house, he would set at supper a single pint upon the table, and, his magnification and say, "Gentlemen, I leave you to your wine." Let he tells his friends, that "he has a heart for all, a "house for all, and, whatever they may think, a "fortune for all"

He sometimes, however, made a splendid dinner, and is said to have wanted no part of the skill or elegance which such performances require. That this magnificence should be often displayed, that obstinate prudence with which he conducted his affairs would not permit, for his revenue, certain and casual, amounted only to about eight hundred pounds a year, of which however he declares himself able to assign one hundred to charity.

Of this fortune, which, as it arose from publick approbation, was very honourably obtained, his imagination seems to have been too full, it would be hard to find a man, so well entitled to notice by his wit, that ever delighted so much in talking of his money. In his Letters, and in his poems, his garden and his grotto, his quincunx and his vines, or some hints of his opulence, are always to be found. The great topick of his ridicule is poverty, the crimes with which he reproaches his antagonists are their debts, their habitation in the Mint, and their want of a dinner. He seems to be of an opinion not very uncommon in the world, that to want money is to want every thing.

Next to the pleasure of contemplating his possessions, seems to be that of enumerating the men of

Fart of it arose from an annuity of two hundred pounds a year, which he had purchased either of the late Dulle of Buckinghamshire, or the Dutchess his mother, and which was charged on some estate of that family [See p S3] The deed by which it was granted was some years in my custody H high rank with whom he was requainted, and whose notice he loudly proclaims not to have been obtained by any prietices of menniess of scrulity a boast which was never defined to he true, and to which very few poets have ever aspired. Pope never set his genius to sale, he never flattered those whom he did not love, or praised those whom he did not love, or praised those whom he did not esteem. Savige however remarked, that he begin a little to relax his dignity when he wrote a distuch for his "Highness s'dog".

i, His admiration of the Great seems to have increased in the advance of life. He passed over piers and statesmen to inseribe his Hiad to Congreve, with a magnanimity of which the praise had been complete, had his friends virtue been equal to his wit. Why he was chosen for so great an honour, it is not now possible to know there is no trace in literary history of any particular intimacy between them. The name of Congreve appears in the Letters among those of his other friends, but without any observable distinction or consequence.

To his latter works, however, he took one to annex names dignified with titles, but was not very happy in his choice for, except Lord Bathurst, none of his noble friends were such as that a good man would wish to have his intimacy with thein known to posterity he can derive hittle honour from the notice of Cobham, Burhington, or Bolingbroke

Of his social qualities, if an estimate be made from his Letters, an opinion too favourable cannot easily be formed they exhibit a perpetual and unclouded effulgence of general benevolence and particular particular fondness There is nothing but liberality, gratitude, constancy, and tenderness It has beenso long said as to be commonly believed, that the tiue characters of men may be found in their Letters, and that he who writes to his friend lays his heart open before him. But the truth is, that such were the simple friendships of the "Golden Age," and are now the friendships only of children Very few can boast of hearts which they dare lay open to themselves, and of which, by whatever accident exposed, they do not shun a distinct and continued view, and, certainly, what we hide from ourselves we do not shew to our friends There is, indeed, no transaction which offers stronger temptations to fallacy and sophistication than epistolary intercourse. eagerness of conversation the first emotions of the mind often burst out before they are considered; in the tumult of business, interest and passion have their genuine effect, but a friendly Letter is a calm and deliberate performance in the cool of leisure, in the stillness of solitude, and surely no man sits down to depreciate by design his own character

Friendship has no tendency to secure veracity, for by whom can a man so much wish to be thought better than he is, as by him whose kindness he desires to gain or keep? Even in writing to the world there is less constraint, the author is not confronted with his reader, and takes his chance of approbation among the different dispositions of mankind, but a Letter is addressed to a single mind, of which the prejudices and partialities are known, and must therefore please, if not by favouring them, by forbearing to oppose them.

 T_0

To charge flose fivourable representations, which men give of then own minds with the guilt of hypocritical falsehood, would shew more severity than knowledge. The writer commonly believes himself Almost every mans thoughts, while they are general are right and most hearts are pure while temptation is away. It is easy to awal en gene rous sentiments in privacy to despise death when, there is no danger to glow with benevolence when there is nothing to be given. While such ideas are formed, they are felt, and self love does not suspect, the gleam of virtue to be the meteor of finey.

If the Letters of Pope are considered merely as compositions they seemed to be premeditated and artificial. It is one thing to write, because there is something which the mind wishes to discharge and another, to oheir the imagination, because ceremony or vanty require something to be written. Pope confesses his early Letters to be vituated with affectation and ambition—to know whether he discintingted himself from these percenters of epistolary integrity—his bool and his life must be set in comparison.

One of his favourite topicls is contempt of his own poetry. Lor this, if it had been real, he would deserve no commendation, and in this he was certainly not sincere, for his high value of himself was sufficiently observed, and of what could be be proud but of his poetry. He writes, he says when "he is has just nothing else to do that the was never at lessure for convention, because he had "always some poetral scheme in his head. It was punctually required that his virting box should.

should be set upon his bed before he rose; and Loid Oxford's domestick related, that, in the dreadful-winter of forty, she was called from her bed by him four times in one night, to supply him with paper, lest he should lose a thought.

He pretends insensibility to censure and criticism, though it was observed by all who knew him that every pamphlet disturbed his quiet, and that his extreme irritability had him open to perpetual vexation, but he wished to despise his criticks, and therefore hoped that he did despise them

As he happened to live in two reigns when the Court paid little attention to poetry, he nursed in his mind a foolish disesteem of Kings, and proclaims that "he never sees Courts". Yet a little regard shewn him by the Prince of Wales inelted his obduracy; and he had not much to say when he was asked by his Royal Highness, "How he could love a Prince "while he disliked Kings"

He very frequently professes contempt of the world, and represents himself as looking on mankind, sometimes with gay indifference, as on emmets of a hillock, below his serious attention, and sometimes with gloomy indignation, as on monsters more worthy of hatred than of pity. These were dispositions apparently counterfeited. How could be despise those whom he lived by pleasing, and on whose approbation his esteem of himself was superstructed? Why should be hate those to whose favour he owed his honour and his ease? Of things that terminate in human life, the world is the proper judge, to despise its sentence, if it were possible, is not just; and if it were just, is not possible. Pope was far enough from this unreasonable temper he was sufficiently a fool to Fume, and his fault was, that he pretended to neglect it. His levity and his sullenness were only in his Letters he passed through common life, sometimes veved, and sometimes pleased, with the natural emotions of common men

His scorn of the Great is too often repeated to be real no man thinks much of that which he despises and as falsehood is always in danger of inconsistency, he makes it his boast at another time that he lives among them

"It is evident that his own importance swells often in his mind. He is afraid of writing, lest the clerks of the Post-office should know his secrets. he has many enemies he considers himself as surrounded by universal jealousy." after many deaths, and many "dispersions, two or three of us, savs he, "may "still be brought together, not to plot, but to divert "ourselves, and the world too, if it pleases and they can live together, and "show what finends wits "may be in spite of all the fools in the world." All this while it was likely that the clerks did not know his land, he certainly had no more enemies than a publick character like his inevitably excites and with what degree of friendship the, wits might live, very few were so much fools as ever to enquire

Some part of this pretended discontent he learned from Swift, and expresses it, I thind, most frequently in his correspondence with him. Swift's resentment was unreasonable, but it was sincere. Pope's was the mere inimicary of his friend, a fictitious part which he began to play before it became him. When he was only twenty-five years old, he related that "a "glut of study and retirement had thrown him on "the world," and that there was danger lest "a glut "of the world should throw him back upon study "and retirement". To this Swift answered with great propriety, that Pope had not yet acted or suffered enough in the world to have become weary of it. And, indeed, it must have been some very powerful reason that can drive back to solitude him who has once enjoyed the pleasures of society.

In the Letters both of Swift and Pope there appears such narrowness of mind, as makes them insensible of any excellence that has not some affinity with their own, and confines their esteem and approbation to so small a number, that whoever should form his opinion of the age from their representation, would suppose them to have lived amidst ignorance and barbarity, unable to find among their contemporaries either virtue or intelligence, and persecuted by those that could not understand them

When Pope mummes at the world, when he professes contempt of fame, when he speaks of inches and poverty, of success and disappointment, with negligent indifference, he certainly does not express his habitual and settled sentiments, but either wilfully disguises his own character, or, what is more likely, invests himself with temporary qualities, and sallies out in the colours of the present moment. His hopes and fears, his joys and sorrows, acted strongly upon his mind, and, if he differed from others, it was not by carelessness, he was mitable and resentful, his malignity to Philips, whom he had first made ridiculous, and then hated for being angry, continued continued too long Of his yain desire to make Bentley contemptible, I never heard any adequate ierson. He was sometimes wanton in his attacks and, before Chandos, Lady Wortley, and Hill, was mean in his retreat

The virtues which seem to have had most of his affection were liberality and fidelity of friendship, in which it does not appear that he was other than he desembes himself it is fortune did not suffer his charity to be splendid and conspicuous, but he assisted Dodsley with a hundred pounds, that he might open shop and, of the subscription of forty pounds a year that he ruised for Surge twenty were paid by himself. He was accused of loving money but his love was eagerness to gun, not solicitude to leep it

In the duties of friendship he was zealous and constant his early maturity of mind commonly united him with men older than himself, and therefore, without attaining any considerable length of life, he saw many companions of his youth sink into the grave bu it does not appear that he lost a single friend by coldness or by mjury, those who loved him once, continued their kindness His ungrateful mention of Allen in his will, was the effect of his adherence to one whom he had known much longer, and whom he naturally loved with greater fond-His violition of the trust reposed in him by Bolingbiole, could have no motive inconsistent with the warme t affection he either thought the action so near to indifferent that he forgot it, or so hudable that he expected his friend to approve it 💃 c tu 1) 1 ; 1 Vor XI

It was reported, with such confidence as almost to enforce belief, that in the papers entrusted to his executors was found a defamatory Life of Swift, which he had prepared as an instrument of vengeance, to be used if any provocation should be ever given About this I enquired of the Earl of Marchmont, who assured me that no such piece was among his remains.

The religion in which he lived and died was that of the Church of Rome, to which in his correspondence with Racine he professes himself a sincere adherent. That he was not scrupulously pious in some part of his life, is known by many idle and indecent applications of sentences taken from the Scriptures; a mode of merriment which a good man dreads for its profaneness, and a witty man disdains for its easiness and vulgarity. But to whatever levities he has been betrayed, it does not appear that his principles were ever corrupted, or that he ever lost his belief of Revelation. The positions which he transmitted from Bolingbioke he seems not to have understood, and was pleased with an interpretation that made them orthodox.

A man of such exalted superiority, and so little moderation, would naturally have all his delinquencies observed and aggravated; those who could not deny that he was excellent, would rejoice to find that he was not perfect.

Perhaps it may be imputed to the unwillingness with which the same man is allowed to possess many advantages, that his learning has been depreciated. He certainly was, in his early life, a man of great literary literary curiosity and, when he wrote his "Essay "on Criticism, had, for his age, a very wide acquaintance with books When he entered into the living world, it seems to have happened to him as to many others, that he was less attentive to dead masters, he studied in the academy of Paracelsus, and made the universe his favourite volume gathered his notions fresh from reality, not from the copies of authors, but the originals of nature there is no reason to believe that literature ever lost his esteem he always professed to love reading, and Dobson, who spent some time at his house translating his " Essay on Man, when I asked him what learning he found him to possess, answered, " More "than I expected His frequent references to history, his allusions to various kinds of knowledge, and his images selected from art and nature, with his observations on the operations of the mind and the modes of life, shew an intelligence perpetually on the wing, excursive, vigorous, and diligent, eager to pursue knowledge, and attentive to retain it

From this curiosity arose the desire of travelling, to which he alludes in his verses to Jervas, and which, though he never found an opportunity to gratify it, did not leave him till his life deof his intellectual character, the constituent and fundamental principle was good sense, a prompt and intuitive perception of consonance and propriety. He saw immediately, of his own conceptions, what was to be chosen, and what to be rejected and, in the works of others, what was to be shunned, and what was to be copied.

~ clined

But good sense alone is a sedate and quiescent quality, which manages its possessions well, but does not increase them, it collects few materials for its own operations, and preserves safety, but never gains supremacy. Pope had likewise genius, a mind active, ambitious, and adventurous, always investigating, always aspiring, in its widest searches still longing to go forward, in its highest flights still wishing to be higher, always imagining something greater than it knows, always endeavoiring more than it can do

To assist these powers, he is said to have had great strength and exactness of memory. That which he had heard or read was not easily lost; and he had before him not only what his own meditations suggested, but what he had found in other writers that might be accommodated to his present purpose

These benefits of nature he improved by incessant and unweared diligence, he had recourse to every source of intelligence, and lost no opportunity of information, he consulted the living as well as the dead, he read his compositions to his friends, and was never content with mediocrity, when excellence could be attained. He considered poetry as the business of his life, and, however he might seem to lament his occupation, he followed it with constancy, to make verses was his first labour, and to mend them was his last

From his attention to poetry he was never diverted. If conversation offered any thing that could be improved, he committed it to paper, if a thought, or perhaps an expression more happy than was common, rose to his mind, he was careful to write it an in dependent distich was preserved for an opportunity of insertion and some little fraginents have been found containing lines, or parts of lines, to be wrought upon at some other time

'He was one of those few whose labour is their pleasure—he was never elevated to negligenee, nor wearied to impatience—he never passed a fault mamend ed by indifference, nor quitted it by despur—He laboured his works first to grun reputation, and afterwards to keep it

Of composition there are different methods. Some employ at once memory and invention, and, with little intermediate use of the pen, form and pole harge masses by continued meditation, and write their productions only when, in their own opinion, they have completed them. It is related of Virgil, that his custom was to pour out a great number of verses in the morning, and pass the day in retrenching exuberances, and correcting inaccuracies. The include of Pope, as may be collected from his translation, was to write his first thoughts in his first words, and gradually to amplify, decorate, rectify, and refine them.

With such ficulties, and such dispositions, he excelled every other writer in poetical prindence. he wrote in such a manner as might expose lum to few linzards. He used almost always the same fabrick of verse and, indeed, by those fewessays which he made of any other, he did not enlarge his reputation. Of this uniformity the certain consequence was readiness and dexterity! By perpetual practice, language had, in his mind, a systematical arrangement, having always the

the same use for words, he had words so selected and combined as to be ready at his call. This increase of facility he confessed himself to have perceived in the progress of his translation

But what was yet of more importance, his effusions were always voluntary, and his subjects chosen by himself His independence secured him from diudging at a task, and labouring upon a bairen topick, he never exchanged praise for money, nor opened a shop of condolence or congratulation His poems, therefore, were scarcely ever temporary. He suffered coronations and royal marriages to pass without a song, and derived no opportunities from recent events, nor any popularity from the accidental disposition of his readers He was never reduced to the necessity of soliciting the sun to shine upon a buth-day, of calling the Graces and Virtues to a wedding, or of saying what multitudes have said When he could produce nothing new, before him he was at liberty to be silent

His publications were for the same reason never hasty. He is said to have sent nothing to the press cill it had lain two years under his inspection; it is at least certain, that he ventured nothing without nice examination. He suffered the tumult of imagination to subside, and the novelties of invention to grow familiar. He knew that the mind is always enamoured of its own productions, and did not trust his first fondness. He consulted his friends, and listened with great willingness to criticism; and, what was of more importance, he consulted himself, and let nothing pass against his own judgment.

He professed to have learned his poetry from Dryden, whom, whenever an opportunity was presented, he praised through his whole life with unvaried liberality and perhaps his character may receive some illustration, if he be compared with his master

Integrity of understanding and nicety of discernment were not allotted in a less proportion to Dryden than to Pope The rectitude of Dryden's mind was sufficiently shewn by the dismission of his poetical prejudices, and the rejection of unnitural thoughts and rugged numbers But Dryden never desired to apply all the judgment that he had He wrote, and professed to write, merely for the people and when he pleased others, he contented himself He spent no time in struggles to rouse litent powers he never attempted to make that better which was already good, nor often to mend what he must have known to be faulty He wrote, as he tells us, with very little consideration, when occasion or necessity called upon him, he poured out what the present moment happened to supply, and, when once it had passed the press, ejected it from his mind for, when he had no pecuniary interest, he had no further solicitude

Pope was not content to satisfy he desired to excel, and therefore always endeavoured to do lns best, he did not court the candour, but dared the judgment of his reader, and, expecting no indulgence from others, he shewed none to himself. He examined lines and words with minute and punctibus observation, and retouched every part with indefatigable diligence, till he had left nothing to be forgiven.

For this reason he kept his pieces very long in his hands, while he considered and reconsidered them. The only poems which can be supposed to have been written with such regard to the times as might hasten their publication, we're the two satures of "Thirty-" eight," of which Dodsky told me that they were brought to him by the author, that they inight be fairly copied. "Almost every line," he said, "was "then written twice over; I gave him a clean transcript, which he sent some time afterwards to me for the press, with almost every line written twice over a second time."

His declaiation, that his care for his work's ceased at their publication, was not strictly true. His parental attention inever abandoned them, what he found affires in the first edition, he silently corrected in those that followed. He appears to have revised the "Had;" and freed it from some of its imperfections; and the "Essay on Criticism" received many implovements after its first "appearance. "It will seldom be found that he aftered without adding clearness, elegance, or vigour. Pope had perhaps the judgment of Dryden; but Dryden certainly wanted the diligence of Pope.

In acquired knowledge, the superiority must be allowed to Dryder, whose education was more scholastick, and who before he became an author had been allowed more time for study, with better means of information. His mind has a larger range, and he collects his images and illustrations from a more extensive-circumference of science Dryden knew more of man in his general nature, and Pope in his local manners. The notions of Dryden were formed by comprehensive speculation and those of Pope by minute attention. I here is more dignity in the knowledge of Dryden, and more certainty in that of Pope

Infinite different and the substrated of Popular substrated by the solid prints of either for both excelled hill have in proceed but Pope did not borrow his proce from his predicessor. The style of Dryden is capricious and varied, that of Pope is cautious and uniform. Dryden observes the motions of his own mind. Pope constrains his mind to his own rules of composition. Dryden is sometimes where ment and rapid. Pôpe is always mooth, uniform, and gentle. Dryden's page is a natural field, rising into inequalities, indidices sified by the varied exiberance of abundant vegetation. Pope's is a velvet lawn, shaven by the secthe, and levelled by the roller sharen by the serthe, and levelled by the roller Of genus, that pawer which constitutes a poet, that quality without which judgment is cold, and knowledge is inert that energy which collects, combines amplifies, and animates, the superiority must, with some he itation, be allowed to Dryden. It is not to be inferred, that of this poetical vigour Pope had only a little, because Dryden had more for every other writer since. Wilton must give place to Pope, and even of Dryden it must be said, that, if he has brighter pulsaraphis, he has not better poems Dryden's performances were dways histy, either excited by some external occusion, or extend by domestick necessity, he composed without consideration, and juiblished without correction. What his ininial could supply at call, or griften in one excursion, was all that he sought, and all that he gave, The dilatory cutton of Pope enabled hum to couldense his sentiments, to multiply his images, and to accumulate all that study might produce, or chance might supply. If the flights of Dryden therefore are higher, Pope continues longer on the wing. If of Dryden's fire the blaze is brighter, of Pope's the heat is more regular and constant. Dryden often surpasses expectation, and Pope never falls below it. Dryden is read with frequent astonishment, and Pope with perpetual delight:

This parallel will, I hope, when it is well considered, be found just; and if the reader should suspect me, as I suspect myself, of some partial fondness for the memory of Dryden, let him not too hastily condemn me; for meditation and enquiry may, perhaps, shew him the reasonableness of my determination.

THE Works of Pope are now to be distinctly examined, not so much with attention to slight faults or petty beauties, as to the general character and effect of each performance.

It seems natural for a young poet to initiate himself by Pastorals, which, not professing to imitate real life, require no experience; and, exhibiting only the simple operation of unmingled passions, admit no subtle reasoning or deep enquiry. Pope's pastorals are not however composed but with close thought; they have reference to the times of the day, the seasons of the year, and the periods of human life. The last, that which turns the attention upon age and death, was the author's favourite. To tell of disappointment and misery, to thicken the darkness of futurity, and perplex the labyrinth of uncertainty, has been always a delicious employment of the poets His preference was probably just I wish, however, that his fondness had not over-looled a line in which the Zephyrs are made to lament in silence

To charge these postorals with want of invention, is to require what was never intended. The imitations are so unbitiously frequent, that the writer evidently means rather to shew his literature than his wit. It is surely sufficient for an author of sixteen, not only to be able to copy the poems of antiquity with judicious selection, but to have obtained sufficient power of language, and skill in metre, to exhibit a series of versification, which had in English poetry no precedent, nor has since had an unitation

The design of Windsor Forest is evidently derived from "Cooper's Hill, with some attention to Waller's poem on "The Park, but Pope cannot be denied to excel his misters in variety and elegance, and the art of interchanging description, narrative, and morality The objection made by Dennis is the want of plan, of a regular subordination of parts terminating in the principal and original design. There is this want in most descriptive poems, because as the scenes, which they must exhibit successively, are all subsisting at the same time, the order in which they are shewn must by necessity be arbitrary, and more is not to be expected from the last part than from the first. The attention, therefore, which cannot be detained by suspense, must be excited by diversity, such as his poem offers to its reader.

But the desire of diversity may be too much indulged the parts of "Windsor Forest which deserve least praise, are those which were added to enliven the stillness of the scene, the appearance of Father Thames, and the transformation of Lodona. Addison had in his "Campaign" derided the Rivers that "rise from their oozy beds" to tell stories of heroes; and it is therefore strange that Pope should adopt a fiction not only unnatural but lately censured. The story of Lodona is told with sweetness, but a new metamorphosis is a ready and puerile expedient; nothing is easier than to tell how a flower was once a blooming virgin, or a rock an obdurate tyrant.

The "Temple of Fame" has, as Steele warmly declared, "a thousand beauties." Every part is splendid, there is great fuxuriance of ornaments; the original vision of Chaucer was never denied to be much improved, the allegory is very skilfully continued, the imagery is properly selected, and learnedly displayed, yet, with all this comprehension of excellence, as its scene is laid in remote ages, and its sentiments, if the concluding paragraph be excepted, have little relation to general manners of common life, it never obtained much notice, but is turned silently over, and seldom quoted or mentioned with either praise or blame.

That The Messiah excels the "Pollio" is no great praise, if it be considered from what original the improvements are derived

The "Verses on the unfortunate Lady" have drawn much attention by the illaudable singularity of treating suicide with respect, and they must be allowed to be written in some parts with vigorous animation, and in others with gentle fenderness, nor has Pope produced any poem in which the sense predominates more over the diction. But the tale is not skilfully "told;

told it is not easy to discover the character of either the Lady or her Guardian. History relates that she was about to disparage herself by a marriage with an inferior. Pope praises her for the dignity of ambition, and yet condemns the uncle to detestation for his pride the ambitious love of a niece, may be obsosed by the interest, malice, or envy of an uncle, but never by his pride. On such an occasion a poet may be allowed to be obscure, but inconsistency never can be right.*

The 'Ode for St Cecilia's Day was undertaken at the desire of Steele in this the author is generally confessed to have miscarried, yet he has miscarried only as compared with Dryden for he has far outgone other competitors. Dryden's plan is better chosen listory will always take stronger hold of the attention than fable the passions excited by Dryden are the pleasures and pains of real life the scene of Pope is laid in imaginary existence. Pope is read with calm acquiescence, Dryden with turbulent delight; Pope hangs upon the ear, and Dryden finds the passes of the mind.

^{*} The account herein before given of this lady and her cata strophe eited by John on from Ruffhed with a kind of acqui e cence in the truth thereof seem no other than might have been extracted from the verses themselves. I have in my possession a letter to Dr Johnson containing the name of the lady, and a reference to a gentleman well known in the literary world for her histor. Him I have seen and from a memorandum of some particulars to the purpo e communicated to him by a lady of quality he informs me that the unfortunate lady a name was Withinbury corruptly pronounced Winbury that she was in love with Pope and would have married him that her guardian though she was deformed in person looking upon such a match as beneath her sent her to a convent; and that a noo e and not a sword put an end to ber life. H

Both the odes want the essential constituent of metrical compositions, the stated recurrence of settled numbers. It may be alleged that Pindar is said by Horace to have written numeris lege solutis: but as no such lax performances have been transmitted to us, the meaning of that expression cannot be fixed; and perhaps the like return might properly be made to a modern Pindarist, as Mr. Cobb received from Bentley, who, when he found his criticisms upon a Greek Exercise, which Cobb had presented, refuted one after another by Pindar's authority, cried out at last, "Pindar was a bold fellow, but thou ait an impufent one."

If Pope's ode be particularly inspected, it will be found that the first stanza consists of sounds well chosen indeed, but only sounds.

The second consists of hyperbolical commonplaces, easily to be found, and perhaps without much difficulty to be as well expressed.

In the third, however, there are numbers, images, harmony, and vigour, not unworthy the antagonist of Dryden. Had all been like this but every part cannot be the best.

The next stanzas place and detain us in the dark and dismal regions of mythology, where neither hope nor fear, neither joy nor sorrow, can be found. the poet however faithfully attends us we have all that can be performed by elegance of diction, or sweetness of versification, but what can form avail without better matter?

The

The last stanza recurs again to common places. The conclusion is too evidently modelled by that of Dryden and it may be remarked that both end with the same fault, the comparison of each is literal on one side, and metaphorical on the other

Poets do not always express their own thoughts Pope, with all this labour in the praise of Musick, was ignorant of its principles, and insensible of its effects

One of his greatest, though of his earliest works, is the "Essay on Criticism," which, if he had written nothing else, would have placed him among the first criticks and the first poets, as it exhibits every mode of excellence that can embellish or dignify didactick composition, selection of matter, novelty of arrangement, justness of precept, splendour of illustration, and propriety of digression. I know not whether it be pleasing to consider that he produced this piece at twenty, and never afterwards excelled it he that delights himself with observing that such powers may be so soon attained, cannot but grieve to think that life was ever after at a stand

To mention the particular beauties of the Essay would be unprofitably tedious—but I cannot forbear to observe, that the comparison of a students progress in the seiences with the journey of a triveller in the Alps, is perhaps the best that English poetry can shew—A simile, to be perfect, must both illustrate and ennoble the subject—must show it to the understanding in a clearer view, and display it to the fancy with greater dignity, but either of these qualities may be sufficient to recommend it—In display.

dactick poetry, of which the great purpose is instruction, a simile may be praised which illustrates, though it does not ennoble, in heroicks, that may be admitted which ennobles, though it does not illustrate. That it may be complete, it is required to exhibit, independently of its references, a pleasing image; for a simile is said to be a short episode. To this antiquity was so attentive, that circumstances were sometimes added, which, having no parallels, served only to fill the imagination and produced what Perrault ludicrously called " comparisons with a long "tail" In their similies the greatest writers have sometimes failed, the ship-race, compared with the chariot-race, is neither illustrated nor aggrandised; land and water make all the difference when Apollo, running after Daphne, is likened to a greyhound chasing a haie, there is nothing gained, the ideas of pursuit and flight are too plain to be made plainer; and a god and the daughter of a god are not represented much to then advantage by a hare and dog. The simile of the Alps has no useless parts, yet affords a striking picture by itself; it makes the forcgoing position better understood, and enables it to take faster hold on the attention; it assists the apprehension, and elevates the fancy.

Let me likewise dwell a little on the celebrated paragraph, in which it is directed that "the sound "should seem an echo to the sense," a precept which Pope is allowed to have observed beyond any other English poet

This notion of representative metre, and the desire of discovering frequent adaptations of the sound to the sense, have produced, in my opinion, many wild wild conceits and imaginary beauties. All that can furnish this representation are the sounds of the words considered singly, and the time in which they are pronounced Every language has some words framed to exhibit the noises which they express, as thump, rattle, growl, hiss These however are but few, and the poet cannot make them more, nor can they be of any use but when sound is to be mentioned. The time of pronunciation was in the dacty lick measures of the learned languages capable of considerable variety but that variety could be accommodated only to motion or duration; and different degrees of motion were perhaps expressed by verses rapid or slow, without much attention of the writer, when the image had full possession of his fancy but our language having little flexibility, our verses can dif-fer very little in their cadence The fancied resemblances, I fear, arise sometimes merely from the ani biguity of words there is supposed to be some relation between a soft line and a soft couch, or between hard syllables and hard fortune

Motion, however, may be in some sort exemplified and yet it may be suspected that in such resemblances the mind often governs the car, and the sounds are estimated by their meaning. One of their most successful attempts has been to describe the labour of Sisvoluss.

: With many a werry step, and many a groan,
Up a high hill be heaves a huge round stone,
The hige round stone, resulting with a bound,
Thinders impetuous down, and snokes along the ground

Vor M Who

Who does not perceive the stone to move slowly upward, and roll violently back? But set the same numbers to another sense,

While many a merry tale, and many a song,
Chear'd the rough road, we wish'd the rough road long
The rough road then, returning in a round,
Mock'd our impanient steps, for all was fany ground

We have now surely lost much of the delay, and much of the rapidity.

But, to shew how little the greatest master of numbers can fix the principles of representative harmony, it will be sufficient to remark that the poet. who tells us, that

When Ajax strives some rock's vast weight to throw.
The line too labours, and the words move slow
Not so, when swift Camilla scours the plain,
Flieso'ei th' unbending coin, and skims along the main;

when he had enjoyed for about thirty years the praise of Camilla's lightness of foot, he tried another experiment upon sound and time, and produced this memorable triplet,

Waller was smooth; but Diyden taught to join The varying verse, the full resounding line, The long majestick march, and energy divine

Here are the swiftness of the rapid race, and the march of slow-paced majesty, exhibited by the same poet in the same sequence of syllables, except that the exact prosodist will find the line of swiftness by one time longer than that of tardiness.

Beauties

Beauties of this kind are commonly fancied and when real, are technical and nugatory, not to be rejected, and not to be obert d

To the profess which have been neconsulated on the "Rape of the Lock" by readers of every class from the critick to the waiting made it is difficult' to make any addition. Of that which is nonverable allowed to be the most at rutine of all ludieros compositions let it rather be now equival from what sources the power of pleasing a derived.

Dr. Warburton, who excelled in critical perguencity, his remarked that the picture tural agents are very bramly adopted to the purper of the poem The Heathen detres on no longer comattention are hould have turned a vay from a centest between Venus and Direct. The engly ment of allegorical persons duals exents com etter of its own about dity they may produce effect, but cannot conduct when the phontom i put in no ion, it die solves thus Discord may raise a mutiny but Dis cord cannot conduct a march or besuge a town Popt brought into view rinew rine of Beings with powers and passions proportionate to their operation The Schills and Gnomes cet, at the toilet and the tea table, what more terrifick and more powerful pliantoms perform on the storms ocean, or the field they give their proper lelp, and do their proper unselucf

Pope is said, by in objector, not to have been the inventor of this petty indion—a charge which might with more justice have been brought against the author of the "Third, who doubtless adopted the religious system of his country—for what is there, but the names of his agents, which Pope has not invented? Has he not assigned them characters and operations never heard of before? Has he not, at least, given them their first poetical existence? If this is not sufficient to denominate his work original, nothing original ever can be written.

In this work are exhibited, in a very high degree, the two most engaging powers of an author. New things are made familiar, and familiar things are made new. A race of acreal people, never heard of before, is presented to us in a manner so clear and easy, that the reader seeks for no further information, but intriediately mingles with his new acquaintance, adopts their interests, and attends their pursuits, loves a Sylph, and detests a Gnome

That familial things are made new, every paragraph will prove. The subject of the poem is an event below the common incidents of common life; nothing real is introduced that is not seen so often as to be no longer regarded, yet the whole detail of a female-day is here brought before us, invested with so much ait of decoration, that, though nothing is disguised, every thing is striking, and we feel all the appetite of curiosity for that from which we have a thousand times turned fastidiously away.

The purpose of the poet is, as he tells us, to laugh at "the little unguarded follies of the female "sex" It is therefore without justice that Dennis charges the "Rape of the Lock" with the want of a moral, and for that reason sets it below the "Lutim," which exposes the pride and discord of the clergy Perhaps neither Pope nor Borleau has made the world much better than he found it, but of they had both succeeded, it were cast to tell who would have deserved most from publick gratitude. The freaks, and humours, and spleen, and vanity of women, as they embroil families in discord, and fill houses with disquiet, do more to obstruet the happiness of life in a year than the ambition of the elergy in many centuries. It has been well observed, that the inserv of man proceeds not from any single crush of overwhelming evil, but from small vexations continually repeated.

It is remarked by Dennis likewise, that the machinery is superfluous—that, by all the bustle of preternatural operation, the main event is neither had tened nor retarded—In this charge an efficacious answer is not easily made. The Sylphs cannot be said to help or to oppose—and it must be allowed to imply some want of art, that their power has not been sufficiently intermingled with the action. Other parts may helewise be charged with want of connection the game at ombie might be spared—but, if the Lady had lost her hair while she was intent upon her eards, it might have been inferred that those who are too fond of play will be in danger of neglecting more unportant interests. Those perhaps are faults but what are such faults to so much excellence.

The epistle of "Eloise to Abelard is one of the most happy productions of human wit the subject is so judiciously chosen, that it would be difficult, in turning over the annals of the world, to find another which so many circumstances concur to recommend. We regularly interest ourselves most in the fortune of those who most deserve our notice. Abelard and Eloise.

Eloise were conspicuous in their days for eminence of merit. The heart naturally loves truth. The adventures and misfortunes of this illustrious pair are known from undisputed history. Their fate does not leave the mind in hopeless dejection; for they both found quiet and consolation in retirement and picty. So new and so affecting is their story, that it supersedes invention; and imagination ranges at full liberty without strangling into scenes of fable.

The story, thus skilfully adopted, has been diligently improved. Pope has left nothing behind him, which seems more the effect of studious perseverance and laborious revisal. Here is particularly observable the curiosa felicitas, a fruitful soil and careful cultivation. Here is no crudeness of sense, nor asperity of language.

The sources from which sentiments, which have so much vigour and efficacy, have been drawn, are shewn to be the mystick writers by the learned author of the "Essay on the Life and Writings of Pope"," a book which teaches how the brow of Criticism may be smoothed, and how she may be enabled, with all her severity, to attract and to delight

The train of my disquisition has now conducted me to that poetical wonder, the translation of the "Iliad," a performance which no age or nation can pretend to equal. To the Greeks translation was almost unknown; it was totally unknown to the inhabitants of Greece. They had no recourse to the Barbarians for poetical beauties, but sought for every thing in Homer, where, indeed, there is but little that they might not find.

The Italians have been very diligent translators but I can hear of no version, unless perhaps Angularas Ovid may be excepted, which is read with eagerness. The "Iliad of Sahimi every reader may discover to be punctiously exact but it seems to be the work of a linguist skilfully pedantick and his countrymen, the proper judges of its power to please, reject it with disgust

Their predecessors the Romans have left some specimens of translation behind them, and that employment must have had some eredit in which Tully and Germanicus engaged but, unless we suppose, what is perhaps true, that the plays of Terence were versions of Menander nothing translated seems ever to have risen to high reputation. The French, in the meridian hour of their learning, were very laudably industrious to enrich their own language with the wisdom of the ancients but found themselves reduced, by whatever necessity, to turn the Greek and Roman poetry into prose. Whoever could read an author, could translate him. From such rivals little can be feared.

The chief help of Pope in this arduous undertaking was drawn from the versions of Dryden Virgil had borrowed much of his imagery from Homer, and part of the debt was now paid by his translator Pope searched the pages of Dryden for happy combinations of heroick diction, but it will not be demed that he added much to what he found. He cultivated our language with so much diligence and art, that he has left in his "Homer a treasure of poetical elegances to posterity. His version may be said to have tuned the English tongue, for, since its appearance.

ance, no writer, however deficient in other powers, has wanted melody. Such a series of lines, so elaborately corrected, and so sweetly modulated, took possession of the publick ear, the vulgar was enamoured of the poem, and the learned wondered at the translation.

But in the most general applause discordant voices will always be heard. It has been objected by some who wish to be numbered among the sons of learning, that Pope's version of Homei is not Homerical · that it exhibits no resemblance of the original and characteristick manner of the Father of Poetry, as it wants his awful simplicity, his aitless grandeur, his unaffected majesty * This cannot be totally denied, but it must be remembered that necessitas quod cogit defendit, that may be lawfully done which cannot be forborn Time and place will always enforce regard. In estimating this translation, consideration must be liad of the nature of our language, the form of our metre, and, above all, of the change which two thousand years have made in the modes of life and the habits of thought Viigil wrote in language of the same general fabrick with that of Homei, in verses of the same measure, and in an age nearer to Homer's time by eighteen ^{*}Bentley was one of these IIe and Pope, soon after the publication of Homer, met at Dr Mead's at dinner, when Pope, desirous of his opinion of the translation, addressed him thus "Dr" Bentley, I ordered my bookseller to send you your books, I "hope you received them" Bentley, who had purposely avoided saying any thing about Homer, pretended not to understand him, and asked, 'Books' books' what books? 'My Homer,' replied Pope, 'which you did me the bonour to subscribe for' 'Oh,' said Bentley, 'ay, now I recollect—your translation—it is a 'pretty poem, Mr Pope, but you must not call it Homer' II hundred.

hundred years—yet he found, even then, the state of the world so much altered, and the demand for elegance so much increased, that mere nature would be endured no longer—and perhaps, in the multitude of borrowed passages, very few can be shewn which he has not embellished

There is a time when nations, emerging from barbarity, and falling into regular subordination, gain leisure to grow wise, and feel the slame of ignorance and the claving pain of unsatisfied curiosity. To this hunger of the mind plain sense is grateful, that which fills the void removes uneasines, and to be free from pain for a while is pleasure, but repletion generates fastidiousness, and knowledge finds no willing reception till it is recommended by artificial diction. Thus, it will be found, in the progress of learning, that in all nations the first writers are simple, and that every age improves in elegance. One refinement always makes way for another, and what was expedient to Virgil was necessary to Pope

I suppose many readers of the English Iliad, when they have been touched with some unexpected beauty of the lighter kind, have tried to enjoy it in the original, where, alast it was not to be found Homer doubtless owes to his translator many Ovidian graces not exactly suitable to his character but to have added can be no great crime, if nothing be taken away Elegance is surely to be desired, if it be not grained at the expence of dignity. A hero would wish to be loved, as well as to be reverenced

To a thousand cavils one answer i sufficient the purpose of a writer is to be read, and the criticism which would destroy the power of pleasing must be blown aside. Pope wrote for his own age and his own nation: he knew that it was necessary to colour the images and point the sentiments of his author, he therefore made him graceful, but lost him some of his sublimity

The copious notes with which the version is accompanied, and by which it is recommended to many readers, though they were undoubtedly written to swell the volumes, ought not to pass without praise commentaries which attract the reader by the pleasure of perusal have not often appeared, the notes of others are read to clear difficulties, those of Pope to vary entertainment.

It has however been objected with sufficient reason, that there is in the commentary too much of unseasonable levity and affected gaiety, that too many appeals are made to the Ladies, and the ease which is so carefully preserved is sometimes the ease of a trifler. Every art has its terms, and every kind of instruction its proper style; the gravity of common criticks may be tedious, but is less despicable than childish merriment.

Of the Odyssey nothing remains to be observed; the same general praise may be given to both translations, and a particular examination of either would require a large volume The notes were written by Broome, who endeavoured, not unsuccessfully, to imitate-his master

Of the Dunciad the hint is confessedly taken from Dryden's "Mac Flecknoe," but the plan is so enlarged and diversified as justly to claim the praise of an original, and affords the best specimen

that

that has yet appeared of personal sature ludicrously

pompous

That the design was morul, whatever the author might tell either his readers or himself, I am not convinced. The first motive was the desire of revenging the contempt with which Theobald had treated his Shakspeare, and regaining the honour which he had lost, by crushing his opponent. Theobald was not so bulk enough to fill a poem, and therefore it was necessary to find other enemies with other names, at whose expense he might divert the publick.

In this design there was petulance and milignity enough but I cannot think it very criminal. An author places himself uncalled before the tribunal of Criticism, and solicits fame at the inzard of disgrace Dulness or deformity are not culpible in themselves, but may be very justly reproched when they pretend to the honour of wit or the influence of beauty. If bad writers were to pass without reprehension, what should restrain them? impune diem consumpserit ingens Telephus and upon bad writers only will censure have much effect. The satire, which brought Theobald and Moore into contempt, dropped impotent from Bentley, like the jwelm of Priam

All truth is valuable, and saturical criticism may be considered as useful when it rectifies error and improves judgment he that refines the publical taste is a publick benefactor

The beauties of this poem are well known its chief fault is the grossness of its images. Pope and Swift had an unnatural delight in ideas physically impure, such as every other tongue inters with un willingness,

willingness, and of which every ear shrinks from the mention.

But even this fault, offensive as it is, may be forgiven for the excellence of other passages, such as the formation and dissolution of Moore, the account of the Traveller, the misfortune of the Florist, and the crowded thoughts and stately numbers which dignify the concluding paragraph

The alterations which have been made in the Duncial, not always for the better, require that it should be published, as in the present collection, with all its variations.

The Essay on Man was a work of great labour and long consideration, but certainly not the happiest of Pope's performances The subject is perhaps not very proper for poetry; and the poet was not sufficiently master of his subject, metaphysical morality was to him a new study, he was proud of his acquisitions, and, supposing himself master of great secrets, was in haste to teach what he had not learned. Thus he tells us, in the first epistle, that from the nature of the Supreme Being may be deduced an order of beings such as mankind, because Infinite Excellence can do only what is best. finds out that these beings must be "somewhere;" and that "all the question is, whether man be in a "wrong place." Surely if, according to the poet's Leibnitian reasoning, we may infer that man ought to be, only because he is, we may allow that his place is the right place, because he has it. Supreme Wisdom is not less infallible in disposing than in creating. But what is meant by somewhere and place, place, and urong place, it had been vain to ask Pope, who probably had never asked himself Having evalted himself into the chair of wisdom, he tells us much that every man I nows, and much that he does not know himself that we see but little, and that the order of the universe is beyond our comprehension an opinion not very uncom-mon and that there is a chain of subordinate beings "from infinite to nothing, of which himself and his readers are equally ignorant But he gives us one comfort, which without his help he supposes unattainable, in the position "that though we are fools, yet God is wise

This Essay affords an egregious instance of the predominance of genius, the dazzling splendour of imagery, and the seductive powers of eloquence Never were penury of knowledge and vulgants of sentiment so happily disguised. The reader feels his mind full, though he learns nothing and, when he meets it in its new array, no longer I nows the talk of his mother and his nurse. When these wonderworking sounds sink into sense, and the doctrine of the Essay, disrobed of its ornaments, is left to the powers of its naked excellence what shall we dis eover? That we are, in comparison with our Creator, very weak and ignorant that we do not uphold the chain of existence and that we could not make one another with more skill than we are made. We may learn yet more that the arts of humou life were copied from the instinctive operations of other ani be said that min was made for geese To these profound principles of natural knowledge are added some moral instructions equally new; that self-interest, well understood, will produce social concord, that men are mutual gamers by mutual benefits; that evil is sometimes balanced by good, that human advantages are unstable and fallacious, of uncertain duration and doubtful effect; that our true honour is, not to have a great part, but to act it well, that virtue only is our own; and that happiness is always in our power

Surely a man of no very comprehensive search may venture to say that he has heard all this before; but it was never till now recommended by such a blaze of embellishments, or such sweetness of melody. The vigorous contraction of some thoughts, the luxurant amplification of others, the incidental illustrations, and sometimes the dignity, sometimes the softness of the verses, enchain philosophy, suspend criticism, and oppress judgment by overpowering pleasure.

This is true of many paragraphs; yet, if I had undertaken to exemplify Pope's felicity of composition before a rigid critick, I should not select the Essay on Man, for it contains more lines unsuccessfully laboured, more harshness of diction, more thoughts imperfectly expressed, more levity without elegance, and more heaviness without strength, than will easily be found in all his other works

The Characters of Men and Women are the product of diligent speculation upon human life much labour has been bestowed upon them, and Pope very seldom laboured in vain. That his excellence may be properly estimated, I recommend a comparison of his Characters of Women, with Boileau's Satire, it will then be seen with how much more perspicacity female nature is investigated, and female excellence selected and he surely is no mean writer to whom Boileau should be found inferior. The Characters of Men, however, are written with more, if not with deeper, thought, and exhibit many passages exquisitely beautiful. The "Gem and the Flower' will not easily be equalled. In the women's part are some defects, the character of Atossa is not so neatly finished as that of Clodio and some of the female characters may be found perhaps more frequently among men, what is said of Philomede was true of Prior.

In the Epistles to Lord Bathurst and Lord Burlington, Dr Warburton has endeavoured to find a train of thought which was never in the writers head, and, to support his hypothesis, lias printed that first which was published last. In one, the most valuable passage is perhaps the Elegy on "Good Sense" and the other, the "End of the "Duke of Buckingham"

The Epistle to Arbuthnot, now arbitrarily called The Prologue to the Satures, is a performance consisting, as it seems, of many fragments wrought into one design, which by this union of scattered beauties contains more striking paragraphs than could probably have been brought together into an occasional work. As there is no stronger motive to exertion than self defence, no part has more elegance, spirit, or dignity, than the poets vindication of his own character. The meanest passage is the satire upon Sporus

Of the two poems which derived their names from the year, and which are called The Epilogue to the Satires, it was very justly remarked by Savage, that the second was in the whole more strongly conceived, and more equally supported, but that it had no single passages equal to the contention in the first for the dignity of Vice, and the celebration of the triumph of Corruption.

The Imitations of Horace seem to have been written as relaxations of his genius. This employment became his favourite by its facility; the plan was ready to his hand, and nothing was required but to accommodate as he could the sentiments of an old author to recent facts or familiar images, but what is easy is seldom excellent, such imitations cannot give pleasure to common readers, the man of learning may be sometimes surprised and delighted by an unexpected parallel, but the comparison requires knowledge of the original, which will likewise often detect strained applications Between Roman images and English manners, there will be an irreconcileable dissimilitude, and the work will be generally uncouth and party coloured, neither original nor translated, neither ancient nor modern .

Pope

Sir Fiancis Page, a judge well known in his time, conceiving that his name was meant to fill up the blank, sent his clerk to Mi Pope, to complain of the insult Pope told the young man that

^{*} In one of these poems is a couplet, to which belongs a story that I once heard the reverend Dr Ridley relate.

[&]quot; Slander or poison dread from Delia's rage,

[&]quot;Hard words, or hanging, it your judge be ルディ

Pope had, in proportions very nicely adjusted to each other, all the qualities that constitute (genius) He had Invention, by which new trains of events are formed, and new scenes of imagery displayed, as in the "Ripe of the Lock and by which extrinsick and adventitions embellishments and illus trations are connected with a known subject, as in the "Essay on Criticism He had Irragination, which strongly impresses on the writers mind, and 2 enables lumi to convey to the reader, the various forms of nature, incidents of life, and energies of passion, as in his " Eloisa, " Windsor Forest, and " Ethick Epistles He had Judgment, which (selects from life or nature what the present purpose requires, and by separating the essence of things from its concomitants, often makes the representation more powerful than the reality and he had colours of language always before him, ready to decorate his matter with every grace of elegant expression, as when he accommodates, his diction to the wonderful multiplicity of Homers sentiments and descriptions

Poetical expression includes sound as well as meaning "Musick," says Dryden, "is inarticu"late poetry, among the excellences of Popc,

Vol XI

n

fliere-

therefore, must be mentioned the melody of his metre. By perusing the works of Dryden, he discovered the most perfect fabrick of English verse, and habituated himself to that only which he found the best; in consequence of which restraint, his poetry has been censured as too uniformly musical, and as glutting the ear with unvaried sweetness. I suspect this objection to be the cant of those who judge by principles rather than perception; and who would even themselves have less pleasure in his works, if he had tried to relieve attention by studied discords, or affected to break his lines and vary his pauses.

But though he was thus careful of his versification, he did not oppress his powers with superfluous rigour. He seems to have thought with Boileau, that the practice of writing might be refined till the difficulty should overbalance the advantage. The construction of his language is not always strictly grammatical; with those i hymes which prescription had conjoined, he contented himself, without regard to Swift's remonstrances, though there was no striking consonance; nor was he very careful to vary his terminations, or to refuse admission, at a small distance, to the same rhymes

To Swift's edict for the exclusion of Alexandrines and Triplets he paid little regard; he admitted them, but, in the opinion of Fenton, too raiely; he uses them more liberally in his translation than his poems.

He has a few double rhymes; and always, I think, unsuccessfully, except once in the "Rape of the "Lock."

Expletives he very early ejected from his verses but he now and then admits an epithet rather commodious than important. Each of the six first lines of the "Hard might lose two syllables with very little diminution of the meaning, and sometimes, after all his art and labour, one verse seems to be made for the sake of another. In his latter productions the diction is sometimes vitiated by Frenchildioms, with which Bolingbroke had perhaps infected him.

I have been told that the couplet by which he de clared his own car to be most gratified was this

Lo, where Mootis sleeps, and hardly flows The freezing Tanais through a waste of snows

But the reason of this preference I cannot discover

It is remarked by Watts that there is scarcely a happy combination of words, or a phrase poetically elegant in the English language, which Pope has not inserted into his version of Honer. How he obtained possession of so many benutics of speech, it were desirable to know. First he gleaned from authors, obscure as well as eminent, what he thought brilhant or useful, and preserved it all in a regular collection, is not unlikely. When, in his last years, Hall's Satires were shewn him, he wished that he had seen them sooner.

New sentiments and new images others may produce but to attempt any farther improvement of versification will be dangerous. Art and diligence have now done their best, and what shall be added will be the effort of tedious toil and needless curiosity.

02

After all this, it is surely superfluous to answer the question that has once been asked, Whether Pope was a poet; otherwise than by asking in return, if Pope be not a poet, where is poetry to be found? To circumscribe poetry by a definition will only shew the narrowness of the definer, though a definition which shall exclude Pope will not easily be made Let us look round upon the present time, and back upon the past, let us enquire to whom the voice of mankind has decreed the wreath of poetry, let then productions be examined, and then claims stated, and the pietensions of Pope will be no more disputed Had he given the world only his version, the name of poet must have been allowed him: if the writer of the "Iliad" were to class his successors, he would assign a very high place to his translator, without requiring any other evidence of Genius.

The following Letter, of which the original is in the hands of Lord Hardwicke, was communicated to me by the kindness of M1 Jodiell.

"To M1. BRIDGES, at the Bishop of London's at Fulham

"SIR,

"The favour of your Letter, with your Remarks, can never be enough acknowledged, and the speed with which you discharged so troublesome a task doubles the obligation.

"I must own, you have pleased me very much by the commendations so ill bestowed upon me; but,

but, I assure you, much more by the frankness of your censure, which I ought to take the more kindly of the two, as it is more advantageous to a scribbler to be improved in his judgment than to be soothed in his vanity The greater part of those deviations, m his vanity. The greater part of those deviations, from the Greek, which you have observed, I was led into by Chapman and Hobbes, who are, it seems as much elebrated for their knowledge of the original, as they are deerted for the badness of their translations. Chapman pretends to have restored the genuine sense of the author, from the mistakes of all formal explainers, in several limited values, and the Cambridge land. inistakes of all formal explainers, in several inndred places and the Cambridge editors of the large Homer in Greek and Latin, attributed so much to Hobbes, that they confess they have corrected the old Latin interpretation very often by his version. For my part, I generally took the author's meaning to be as you have explained it bet their authority, joined to the knowledge of my own imauthority, joined to the knowledge of my own imperfectnes in the language, overruled me. However, Sir, you may be confident I think you in the right, because you happen to be of my opinion for men (let them say what they will) never approve any others sense, but as it squares with their own But you have made me much more proud of, and positive in my judgment, since it is strengthened by yours. I think your criticisms, which regard the expression, very just, and shall make my profit of them, to give you some proof that I am in carnest, I will alter three verses on your bare objection, though I have Mr. Devdens, example for each of though I have Mr Dryden's example for each of them And this, I hope, you will account no small piece of obedience, from one, who values the mithority thority of one true poet above that of twenty criticles or commentators. But, though I speak thus of commentators, I will continue to read carefully all I can procure, to make up, that way, for my own want of critical understanding in the original beauties of Homei. Though the greatest of them are certainly those of Invention and Design, which are not at all confined to the language for the distinguishing excellences of Homer are (by the consent of the best criticks of all nations) first in the manners (which include all the speeches, as being no other than the representations of each person's manners by his words), and then in that raptine and fire, which carries you away with him, with that wonderful force, that no man who has a true poetical spirit is master of himself, while he reads him makes you interested and concerned before you are aware, all at once, whereas Viigil does it by soft degrees This, I believe, is what a translator of Homei ought principally to imitate, and it is very hard for any translator to come up to it, because the chief reason why all translations fall short of their originals is, that the very constraint they are obliged to, renders them heavy and disputted

"The great beauty of Homer's language, as I take it, consists in that noble simplicity which runs through all his works, (and yet his diction, contrary to what one would imagine consistent with simplicity, is at the same time very copious.) I don't know how I have run into this pedantiy in a Letter, but I find I have said too much, as well as spoken too inconsiderately—what faither thoughts I have upon this subject, I shall be glad to communicate to you (for my own improvement) when we meet which is a happiness I very entriestly desire, as I do likewise some opportunity of proving how much I think myself obliged to your friendship, and how truly I am, Sir,

" Your most faithful, humble servant,

"A Pope

The Criticism upon Pope's Epitaphs, which was printed in "The Universal Visitor, is placed here being too minute and particular to be inserted in the Life.

EVERY Art is best taught by example Nothing contributes more to the cultivation of propriety, than remarks on the works of those who have most excelled I shall therefore endeavour, at this visit, to entertain the joung students in poetry with an examination of Pope's Epitaplis

To define an epitaph is useless, every one knows that it is an inscription on a Tomb. An epitaph, therefore implies no particular character of writing, but may be composed in verse or prose. It is indeed commonly panegyrical because we are seldom distinguished with a stone but by our friends but it has no rule to restrain or modify it, except this, that it ought not to be longer than common beholders may be expected to have leisure and patience to peruse

I.

On Charles Earl of Dorses, in the Church of Wythyham in Sussex.

Dorset, the grace of courts, the Muse's pride,
Patron of arts, and judge of nature, dy'd
The scourge of pride, though sanctify'd or great,
Of fops in learning, and of knaves in state,
Yet soft in nature, though severe his lay,
His anger moral, and his visdom gay
Blest saturet who tauch'd the means so true,
As show'd, Vice had his hate and pity too
Blest courtier who could king and country please,
Yet sacred kept his friendships, and his ease
Blest peer his great forefather's every grace
Reflecting, and reflected in his race,
Where other Buckhnists, other Dorsets shine,
And patriots still, or poets, deck the line

The first distich of this epitaph contains a kind of information which few would want, that the man for whom the tomb was creeted, died. There are indeed some qualities worthy of praise ascribed to the dead, but none that were likely to exempt him from the lot of man, or incline us much to wonder that he should die. What is meant by "judge of na-"ture," is not easy to say. Nature is not the object of human judgment, for it is vain to judge where we cannot alter. If by nature is meant what is commonly called nature by the criticks, a just representation of things really existing, and actions really performed, nature cannot be properly opposed to art nature being, in this sense, only the best effect of art

The scourge of pride-

Of this couplet, the second line is not, what is intended, an illustration of the former Pride in the Great, is indeed well enough connected with knaves in state, though knaves is a word rather too ludicrous and light but the mention of sanctified pride will not lead the thoughts to fops in learning, but rither to some species of tyrining or oppression, something more gloomy and more formidable than foppery

Yet soft his nature -- '

This is a high compliment, but was not first be stowed on Dorset by Pope The next verse is extremely beautiful

Blest saturist 1 -

In this distich is another line of which Pope was not the author. I do not mean to blame these imitations with much liarshness in long performances they are scarcely to be avoided, and in shorter they may be indulged because the train of the composition may naturally involve them, or the scantiness of the subject allow little choice. However, what is borrowed is not to be enjoyed as our own, and it is the business of critical justice to give every bird of the Muscs his proper feather.

Blest courtier !-

Whether

I.

On Charles Earl of Dorset, in the Church of Wythyham in Sussex.

Dorset, the grace of courts, the Muse's pride,
Patron of arts, and judge of nature, dy'd
The scourge of pride, though sanctify'd or great,
Of fops in learning, and of knaves in state,
Yet soft in nature, though severe his lay,
His anger moral, and his wisdom gay
Blest saturist! who touch'd the means so true,
As show'd, Vice had his hate and pity too
Blest courtier! who could king and country please,
Yet sacred kept his friendships, and his ease
Blest peer! his great forefather's every grace
Reflecting, and reflected in his race,
Where other Buckhursts, other Dorsets shine,
And patriots still, or poets, deck the line

The first distich of this epitaph contains a kind of information which few would want, that the man for whom the tomb was elected, died. There are indeed some qualities worthy of praise ascribed to the dead, but none that were likely to exempt him from the lot of man, or incline us much to wonder that he should die. What is meant by "judge of na-"ture," is not easy to say. Nature is not the object of human judgment, for it is vain to judge where we cannot alter. If by nature is meant what is commonly called nature by the criticks, a just representation of things really existing, and actions really performed, nature cannot be properly opposed to

art - nature being, in this sense, only the best effect of art

The scourge of pride-

Of this couplet, the second line is not, what is intended, an illustration of the former Pride in the Great, is indeed well enough connected with knives in state, though knaves is a word rather too ludierous and light but the mention of santified pride will not lead the thoughts to fops in learning, but rather to some species of training or oppression, something more gloomy and more formidable than foppers

Yet soft his nature -

This is a high compliment, but was not first be stowed on Dorset by Pope The next verse is extremely beautiful

Blest satırıst ! —

In this distich is another line of which Pope was not the author—I do not mean to blaine these initiations with much harshness—in long performances they are searedly to be avoided—and in shorter they may be indulged, because the train of the composition may naturally involve them, or the scantiness of the subject allow little choice—However, what is horrowed is not to be enjoyed as our own—and it is the business of critical justice to give every bird of the Muses his proper feather

Blest courtier !-

Whether a counter can properly be commended for keeping his ease sacred, may perhaps be disputable. To please king and country, without sacrificing friendship to any change of times, was a very uncommon instance of prudence or felicity, and deserved to be kept separate from so poor a commendation as care of his ease. I wish our poets would attend a little more accurately to the use of the word sacred, which surely should never be applied in a serious composition, but where some reference may be made to a higher Being, or where some duty is exacted or implied. A man may keep his friendship sacred, because promises of friendship are very awful ties; but methinks he cannot, but in a burlesque sense, be said to keep his ease sacred.

Blest peer !

The blessing ascribed to the peer has no connection with his peerage: they might happen to any other man whose ancestors were remembered, or whose posterity are likely to be regarded.

I know not whether this epitaph be worthy either of the writer or the man entombed.

II.

On Sir William Trumbull, one of the Principal Secretaries of State to King William III who having resigned his place, died in his retirement at Easthamstead in Berkshire, 1716.

A pleasing form, a firm, yet cautious mind; Sincere, though prudent, constant, yet resign'd,

Honour

Honour unchang d, a principle profest,
Fix d to one sud, but moderate to the rest
An honest courtier, yet a patriot too
Just to lus prince, and to his country true,
Fill d with the sense of age, the fire of youth,
A scorn of wringling, yet a zeal for truth,
A generous faith, from superstition free,
A love to peace, and hate of tyrainy,
Such this man was, who now, from earth remov d,
At length enjoys that liberty he lov d

In this epitaph, as in many others, there appears, at the first view, a fault which I think searcely any beauty can compensate. The name is omitted. The end of an epitaph is to convey some account of the dead, and to what purpose is any thing told of him whose name is concealed? An opitaph, and a history of a nameless hero, are equally absurd, since the virtues and qualities o recounted in either are entered at the mercy of fortune to be appropriated by guess. The name, it is true, may be read upon the stone but what obligation has it to the poet, whose verses wander over the carth, and leave their subject behind them, and who is forced, like an unskilful painter, to male his purpose known by adventitious help.

This epitrph is wholly without elevation and contains nothing striking or particular but the poet is not to be blumed for the defects of his subject. He said perhaps the best that could be said. There are, however, some defects which were not made necessary by the character in which he was employed. There is no opposition between an honest counter.

courtier and a patriot, for, an honest courtier cannot but be a patriot

It was unsuitable to the nicety required in short compositions, to close his verse with the word too: every rhyme should be a word of emphasis, nor can this rule be safely neglected, except where the length of the poem makes slight maccuracies excusable, or allows room for beauties sufficient to overpower the effects of petty faults.

At the beginning of the seventh line the word filled is weak and prosaic, having no particular adaptation to any of the words that follow it

The thought in the last line is impertment, having no connexion with the foregoing character, nor with the condition of the man described. Had the epitaph been written on the poor conspirator—who died lately in prison, after a confinement of more than forty years, without any crime proved against him, the sentiment had been just and pathetical, but why should Trumbull be congratulated upon his liberty, who had never known restraint?

III

On the Hon Simon Harcourt, only Son of the Lord Chancellor Harcourt, at the Church of Stanton-Harcourt in Oxfordshire, 1720.

To this sad shrine, whoe'er thou ait, draw near, Here lies the friend most lov'd, the son most dear Who ne'er knew joy, but friendship might divide, Or gave his father grief but when he dy'd

 $^{\prime\prime}$ Major Bernar h , who died in Newgate, Sept 20, 1736 See Gent Mag vol L p 125 $\,$ N

How vain is reason, cloquence how weak!

If Pope must tell what Harcourt cannot speak

Oh! let thy once lov d friend inscribe thy stone,

And with a father's sorrows mix his own!

This epitaph is principally remarkable for the artful introduction of the name, which is inserted with a peculiar felicity, to which chance must concur with genius, which no inan can hope to attain twice, and which cannot be copied but with servile imitation

I cannot but wish that, of this inscription, the two last lines had been omitted, as they take away from the energy what they do not add to the sense

IV

On Junes Craggs, Esq In Hestminster Abbey

FEGI MAGNAE BPITANNIAE A SELRETIS
ET CONSTITUS SANCTIOPIBLS,
I FINCIPIS PARITER AC POPULI ANOR ET DELICIAE
VIXIT TITULIS ET INVIDIA MAJOR
ANNOS HEV PAUCOS, NAVO
OU FEB NU MOCON

Statesman, yet fuend to truth! of soul sineere, In action faithful, and in honour clear! Who broke no promise, serv d no private end, Who gain d no title, and who lost no friend Ennobled by himself, by all approv d, Prais d, wepf, and honour d, by the Muse he lov d

The

The lines on Ciaggs were not originally intended for an epitaph, and therefore some faults are to be imputed to the violence with which they are torn from the poem that first contained them. We may, however, observe some defects. There is a redundancy of words in the first couplet: it is superfluous to tell of him, who was sincere, true, and faithful, that he was in honour clear.

There seems to be an opposition intended in the fourth line, which is not very obvious—where is the relation between the two positions, that he gained no title and lost no friend?

It may be proper here to remark the absurdity of joining, in the same inscription, Latin and English, or verse and prose. If either language be preferable to the other, let that only be used, for, no reason can be given why part of the information should be given in one tongue, and part in another, on a tomb, more than in any other place, or any other occasion, and to tell all that can be conveniently told in verse, and then to call in the help of prose, has always the appearance of a very artless expedient, or of an attempt unaccomplished. Such an epitaph resembles the conversation of a foreigner, who tells part of his meaning by words, and conveys part by signs.

 $\mathbb{V}.$

Intended for Mr Rowe. In Westminster-Abbey*.

Thy reliques, Rowe, to this fair urn we trust, And sacred, plac'd by Dryden's awful dust,

* This was altered much for the better as it now stands onthe monument in the Abbey erected to Rowe and his daughter

> WARB Beneath

Benerth a rude and naincless stone he,hes,
1 To which thy tomb shill guide inquiring eyes
1 Pence to thy bentle shade, and entiles rest
1 Blest in thy benius, in thy love too blest
1 One brateful, woman to thy fame supplies
What a whole thrukless lind to his denies

Of this inscription the cluef fault is, that it belongs less to Rowe, for whom it is written, than to Dryden, who was buried near him and indeed give-very little information concerning either

To wish' Peace to thy shade is too in thological to be admitted into a Christian temple—the encient worship has infected almost all our other compositions, and might therefore be contented to spire our epitaphs—Let fiction, at least, cease with life and let us be serious over the grive.

VΙ

On Mrs Corbet, " who died of a Cancer in her Breast*

Here rests a woman, good without pretence, Blest with plain reason, and with sober sense. No conquest she, but o er herself, desir d No arts essay d, but not to be admir d 1 Passion and pride were to her soul unknowh, Cowine d that Virtue only is our own So unaffected, so compos d a mind, So firm, yet soft, so strong, yet so refin d Heaven, as its purest gold, by tortures try d, The saint sustain dit, but the woman dy d

^{*} In the North aile of the pan h church of St Margaret, Westminster II

I have

I have always considered this as the most valuable of all Pope's epitaphs, the subject of it is a character not discriminated by any slining or eminent peculiarities; yet that which really makes though not the splendour, the felicity of life, and that which every wise men will choose for his final and lasting companion in the langour of age, in the quiet of privacy, when he departs yeary and disgusted from the ostentations, the volatile, and the vain. Of such a character, which the dull overlook, and the gay despise, it was fit that the value should be made known, and the diemt, established. Domestick virtue, as it is excited without great occasions, or conspicuous consequences, in an even inmoted tenour, required the genius of Pope to display it in such a manner as might attract regard, and enforce Who can forbear to lament that this reverence amiable woman has no name in the verses?

If the particular lines of this in cription be examined, it will appear less faulty than the rest. There is scarcely one line taken from common places, unless it be that in which only Fature is said to be our own. I once heard a Lady of great beauty and elegance object to the fourth line, that it contained an unnatural and incredible panegyrick. Of this let the Ladies judge.

VII

On the Monument of the Hon Robert Digby, and of his Sister Mary, erected by their Futher the Lord Digby, in the church of Sherborne in Dorsetshire, 1727

Go! fair example of nutrinted vonth,
Of modest wi dom, and prenfic truth
Compos d in sufferings, and in joy sedate,
Good without noise, without pretension great
Just of thy word, in every thought sincere,
Who knew no wish but what the world might hear
Of softest manners ' unaffected mind,
Lover of peace, and friend of human kind
Go, live! for heaven's eternal year is thine,
Go, and exalt thy mortal to d vine

And thou, blest mad 1 attendant on his doom, Pensive hast follow d to the silent tomb, Steer d the same course to the same quiet shore, Not parted long, and now to part no more 1 Go, then, where only bliss sineere is known 1 Go, where to love and to enjoy are one 1 Yet take these tear, Mortality's relief, And, till we share your joys, forgive our grief These little rites, a stone, a verse receive, Its all a father, all a friend can give 1

This epituph contains of the brother only a general indiscriminate character, and of the sister tells nothing but that she died. The difficulty in writing epitaphs is to give a particular and appropriate praise. This, however, is not always to be performed, whatever be the diligence or ability of the writer for, the greater part of mankind have no character at all, have hittle that distinguishes them from others equally Vol. Al. P. good good or bad, and therefore nothing can be said of them which may not be applied with equal propriety to a thousand more. It is indeed no great panegyrick, that there is inclosed in this tomb one who was born in one year, and died in another; yet many useful and amiable lives have been spent, which yet leave little materials for any other memorial. These are however not the proper subjects of poetry, and whenever friendship, or any other motive, obliges a poet to write on such subjects, he must be forgiven if he sometimes wanders in generalities, and utters the same praises over different tombs.

The scantiness of human praises can scarcely be made more apparent, than by remarking how often Pope has, in the few epitaphs which he composed, found it necessary to borrow from himself. The fourteen epitaphs which he has written, comprise about an hundred and forty lines, in which there are more repetitions than will easily be found in all the rest of his works. In the eight lines which make the character of Digby, there is scarce any thought, or word, which may not be found in the other epitaphs

The ninth line, which is far the strongest and most elegant, is borrowed from Dryden. The conclusion is the same with that on Harcourt, but is here more elegant and better connected.

VIII

On Su Godfrey Kneller In Westminster Abbey, 1723

Kneller, by Heaven, and not a master, taught, Whosé art was nature and whose pictures thought, Now for two ages, having snatch d from fate Whate er was beauteous, or white er was great, Lies crown d with Princes honours, Poets lays, Due to his merit, and brave thirst of praise

Living, great Nature foot d he might outrie Her works, and dying, fears herself may die

Of this epitaph the first couplet is good, the se cond not bid, the third is deformed with a broken metaphor, the word crowned not being applicable to the honours or the lays and the fourth is not only borrowed from the epitaph on Raphael, but of a very harsh construction

IΧ

On General HENRY WITHERS In Westminster Abbey, 1729

Here, Withers, rest¹ thou bravest, gentle t mind,
Thy country s friend but more of human kind
O¹ born to arms¹ O¹ worth in youth approv d¹
O¹ soft humanity in age belov d¹
For thee the hardy veteran drops a tear,
And the gay courter feels the sigh sincere.
Withers, adieu¹ yet not with thee remove
Thy martial spirit, or thy social love¹
Amidst corruption, luvury, and rage,
Still leave some ancient virtues to our age
Nor let us say (those Finglish glories gone)
The last true Briton lies beneath this stone

The

The epitaph on Withers affords another instance of common places, though somewhat diversified, by mingled qualities, and the peculiarity of a profession.

The second couplet is abrupt, general, and unpleasing, exclamation seldom succeeds in our language; and, I think, it may be observed that the particle O' used at the beginning of the sentence, always offends

The third couplet is more happy; the value expressed for him, by different sorts of men, raises him to esteem, there is yet something of the common cant of superficial satursts, who suppose that the insincerity of a courtier destroys all his sensations, and that he is equally a dissembler to the living and the dead

At the third couplet I should wish the epitaph to close, but that I should be unwilling to lose the two next lines, which yet are dearly bought if they cannot be retained without the four that follow them.

X.

On Mi Elijah Fenton, At Easthamstead in Berkshire, 1730.

This modest stone, what few vain marbles can, May truly say, Here hes an honest man A Poet, blest beyond the Poet's fate, Whom Heaven kept sacred from the Proud and Great Foe to loud praise, and friend to learned ease, Content with science in the vale of peace Calmly he look'd on either life, and here Saw nothing to regret, or there to fear, From Nature's temperate feast rose satisfy'd, Thank'd Heaven that he liv'd, and that he dy'd.

The first couplet of this epitaph is borrowed from Crashaw The four next lines contain a species of praise, peculiar, original, and just Here, therefore, the inscription should have ended, the latter part containing nothing but what is common to-every man who is wise and good The character of Fenton was so amiable, that I cannot forbear to wish for some poet or biographer to display it more fully for the advantage of posterity If he did not stand in the first rank of genius, he may claim a place in the second, and, whatever criticism may object to his writings, censure could find very little to blame in his life

XI

On Mr G 13 In Westminster-Abbey, 1732

Of manners gentle, of affections mild, In wit, a man simplicity, a child With native humour tempering virtuous rage, form d to delight at once and lash the age, Above temptation, in a low estate, And uncorrupted, evin among the Great A safe companion and an easy friend, Unblam d through life, lamented in thy end, These are thy honours I not that here thy bust Is mix A with heroes, or with hings thy dust, But that the Worthy and the Good shall say, Striking then pensive bosoms—Here hes GA1 1

As Gay was the favourite of our author, this epi taph was probably written with an uncommon degree of attention—yet it is not more successfully executed than the rest, for it will not always happen that that the success of a poet is proportionate to his labour. The same observation may be extended to all works of imagination, which are often influenced by causes wholly out of the performer's power, by hints of which he perceives not the origin, by sudden elevations of mind which he cannot produce in himself, and which sometimes rise when he expects them least.

The two parts of the first line are only echoes of each other; gentle manners and mild affections, if they mean any thing, must mean the same

That Gay was a man in wit is a very frigid commendation, to have the wit of a man is not much for a poet. The wit of man, and the simplicity of a child, make a poor and vulgar contrast, and raise no ideas of excellence, either intellectual or moral

In the next couplet rage is less properly introduced after the mention of mildness and gentleness, which are made the constituents of his character; for a man so mild and gentle to temper his rage, was not difficult.

The next line is inhaimonious in its sound, and mean in its conception, the opposition is obvious, and the word lash used absolutely, and without any modification, is gioss and improper.

To be above temptation in poverty, and free from corruption among the Great, is indeed such a peculiarity as deserved notice. But to be a safe companion is a praise merely negative, arising not from possession of virtue, but the absence of vice, and that one of the most odious.

Her wit was more than man, her innocence a child"

DRYDEN on Mrs Killigrew C

As little can be added to his character, by asserting that he was lamented in his end Every man that dies is, at least by the writer of his epitaph, supposed to be lamented and therefore this general lamentation does no honour to Gay

The first eight lines have no grammur, the adjectives are without any substantive, and the epithets without a subject

The thought in the list line, that Gay is buried in the bosoms of the worthy and the good, who are distinguished only to lengthen the line, is so dark that few understand it and so harsh, when it is explained, that still fewer approve

XII

Intended for Sii Isaac Newton
In Westminster Abbey

ISAACUS NEWTONIUS
Quem Immortalem
Testantur, Tempus, Natura, Cælum

Mortalem
Hoc marmor fatetur

Nature, and Nature s laws, lay hid in night
God said, Let Newton be! And all was light

Of this epitaph, short as it is, the faults seem not to be very few Why purt should be Latin, and part English, it is not casy to discover In the Latin the opposition of Immortalis and Mortalis, is a mere sound, or a mere quibble he is not immortal in any sense contrary to that in which he is mortal

In the verses the thought is obvious, and tho words might and light are too nearly alhed

IIIX

On EDMUND Duke of Buckingham, who died in the 19th Year of his Age, 1735.

If modest youth, with cool reflection crown'd, And every opening with blooming round, Could save a parent's justest pinde from fate, Or add one patriot to a sinking state.

This weeping marble had not ask'd thy tear, Or sadly told how many hopes he here!

The hving virtue now had shone approv'd,

The senate heard him, and his country lov'd. Yet softer honours, and less noisy fame,

Attend the shade of gentle Buckingham

In whom a race, for courage fam'd and art,

Ends in the milder merit of the heart

And, chiefs or sages long to Britain given,

Pays the last tribute of a saint to Heaven

This epitaph Mr. Warburton prefers to the rest; but I know not for what reason. To crown with reflection is surely a mode of speech approaching to nonsense. Opening virtues blooming round, is something like tautology, the six following lines are poor and prosaick. Art is in another couplet used for arts, that a thyme may be had to heart. The six last lines are the best, but not excellent.

The rest of his sepulchral performances hardly deserve the notice of criticism. The contemptible "Dialogue" between Hr and Shr should have been suppressed for the author's sake.

In his last epitaph on himself, in which he attempts to be jocular upon one of the few things that that make wise men serious, he confounds the living man with the dead

Under this stone, or under this sill, Or under this turf, &c

When a man is once buried, the question, under what he is buried, is easily decided. He forgot that though he wrote the epitaph in a state of uncertainty, jet it could not be laid over him till his grave was made. Such is the folly of wit when it is ill employed.

The world has but little new even this wretchedness seems to have been borrowed from the following tuneless lines

Ludovici Areosti humantur ossa
Sub hoc marmore, vel sub hac humo, seu
Sub quiequid volint benignus heres
Sive liærede benignior comes, seu
Opportunius meidens Viator
Nam seire haud potuit futura, sed nee
Tanti erat vacuim sibi erdaver
Ut urnam cuperet parare vivens,
Vivens ista tamen sibi paravit
Quæ inseribi voluit suo sepulchro
Olim siquod haberit is sepulchrum

Surely Ariosto did not venture to expect that his trifle would have ever had such an illustrious imitator,

PITT.

CHRISTOPHER PITT, of whom whatever I shall relate, more than has been already published, I owe to the kind communication of Di. Waiton, was born in 1699 at Blandford, the son of a physician much esteemed.

He was, in 1714, received as a scholar into Winchester College, where he was distinguished by exercises of uncommon elegance, and at his removal to New College in 1719, presented to the electors, as the product of his private and voluntary studies, a complete version of Lucan's poem, which he did not then know to have been translated by Rowe

This is an instance of early diligence which well deserves to be recorded. The suppression of such a work, recommended by such uncommon circumstances, is to be regretted. It is indeed culpable to load libraries with superfluous books, but incitements to early excellence are never superfluous, and from this example the danger is not great of many imitations.

When he had resided at his college three years, he was presented to the rectory of Pimpern in Dorsetshire (1722), by his relation, Mr Pitt of Stratfield Say in Hampshire; and, resigning his fellowship, continued at Oxford two years longer, till he became Master of Arts (1724).

He probably about this time translated "Vida's "Art of Poetry," which Tristram's splendid edition had had then made popular. In this translation lie distinguished himself, both by his general eleganee, and by the skilful adaptation of his numbers to the images expressed a beauty which Vida has with great ardour enforced and exemplified.

He then retired to his living, a place very pleasing by its situation, and therefore hiely to exeite the imagination of a poet—where he passed the rest of his life, reverenced for his virtue, and heloved for the softness of his temper and the ensiness of his manners. Before strangers he had something of the scholars tunidity or distrust—but when he became furnisher he was in a very high degree cheerful and entertaining. His general benevolence procured general respect—and he passed a life placed and he nourable, neither too great for the kindness of the low, nor too low for the notice of the great

AT what time he composed his miscelling, published in 1727, it is not easy or necessing to know those which have dates appear to have been very early productions, and I have not observed that any rise above mediocrity

The success of his Vida animated him to a higher undertaking and in his thirtieth year he published a version of the first book of the Eneid. This being, I suppose, commended by his friends, he some time afterwards added three or four more with an advertisement, in which he represents himself as translating with great indifference, and with a progress of which himself was hardly conseious. This can hardly be true, and, if true, is nothing to the reader

At last, without any further contention with his modesty, or any awe of the name of Dryden, he gave us a complete English Eneid, which I am sorry not to see joined in this publication with his other poems*. It would have been pleasing to have an opportunity of comparing the two best translations that perhaps were ever produced by one nation of the same author.

Pitt, engaging as a rival with Dryden, naturally observed his failures, and avoided them; and, as he wrote after Pope's Iliad, he had an example of an exact, equable, and splendid versification. With these advantages, seconded by great diligence, he might successfully labour particular passages, and escape many errors. If the two versions are compared, perhaps the result would be, that Dryden leads the reader forward by his general vigour and sprightliness, and Pitt often stops him to contemplate the excellence of a single couplet, that Dryden's faults are forgotten in the hurry of delight, and that Pitt's beauties are neglected in the languor of a cold and listless perusal, that Pitt pleases the criticks, and Dryden the people; that Pitt is quoted, and Dryden read.

He did not long enjoy the reputation which this great work deservedly conferred; for he left the world in 1748, and lies buried under a stone at Blandford, on which is this inscription.

In Memoiy of
CHR PITT, clerk, M A.
Very eminent for his talents in poetry, and yet more for the universal candour of his mind, and the primitive simplicity of his manners.
He lived innocent,
and died beloved,
Apr 13, 1748,
aged 48

E It has since been added to the collection. R.

THOMSON

James Thomson, the son of a minister well esteemed for his piety and diligence, was born September 7, 1700, at Ednam in the shire of Roxburgh, of which his father was pastor. His mother, whose name was Hume*, inherited as co heress a portion of a small estate. The revenue of a parish in Scotland is seldom large, and it was probably in commiscration of the difficulty with which Mr. Thomson supported his family, having nine children, that Mr. Riccarton, a neighbouring minister, discovering in James uncommon promises of future evellence, undertook to superintend his education, and provide him books.

He was taught the common rudiments of learning at the school of Jedburg, a place which he delights to recollect in his poem of "Autumn, but was not considered by his master as superior to common boys, though in those early days he amused his pation and his friends with poetical compositions with which, however, he so little pleased himself, that on every new years day he threw into the fire all the productions of the foregoing year

^{*} His mother's name was Beatrix Trotter His grandmother's name was Hume C

From the school he was removed to Edinburgh, where he had not resided two years when his father died, and left all his children to the care of their mother, who raised upon her little estate what money a mortgage could afford, and, removing with her family to Edinburgh, lived to see her son rising into emmence.

The design of Thomson's friends was to breed him a minister. He lived at Edinburgh, as at school, without distinction or expectation, till, at the usual time, he performed a probationary exercise by explaining a psalm. His diction was so poetically splendid, that Mi Hamilton, the professor of Divinity, reproved him for speaking language unintelligible to a popular audience, and he censured one of his expressions as indecent, if not profane

This rebuke is reported to have repressed his thoughts of an ecclesiastical character, and he probably cultivated with new diligence his blossoms of poetry, which, however, were in some danger of a blast, for, submitting his productions to some who thought themselves qualified to criticise, he heard of nothing but faults, but, finding other judges more favourable, he did not suffer himself to sink into despondence

He easily discovered that the only stage on which a poet could appear, with any hope of advantage, was London, a place too wide for the operation of petty competition and private malignity, where ment might soon become conspicuous, and would find friends as soon as it became reputable to befriend it. A lady who was acquainted with his mother, advised him to the journey, and promised some countenance or assistance, which at last he never received however, he justified his adventure by her encouragement, and came to seek in London patronage and fame

At his arrival he found his way to Mr Mallet, then tutor to the sons of the Duke of Montiose He had recommendations to several persons of consequence, which he had tied up earcfully in his handkerchief but as he passed along the street, with the gaping euriosity of a new comer, his attention was upon every thing rather than his poel et, and his magazine of ciedentals was stolen from him

His first want was a pair of shoes. For the supply of all his necessities, his whole fund was his Winter, which for a time could find no purchaser till, at last, Mr Millan was persuaded to buy it at a low price and this low price he had for some time reason to regret but, by accident, Mr Whatley, a man not wholly unknown among authors, happening to turn his eve upon it, was so delighted that he ran from place to place celebrating its excellence. Thomson obtained likewise the notice of Anion Hill, whom, being friendless and indigent, and glad of kindness, he courted with every expression of servile adulation

Munter was dedicated to Sir Spencer Compton, but attracted no regard from him to the author—till Auron Hill—awakened his attention by some verses addressed to Thomson, and published in one of the newspapers, which censured the great for their neglect of ingenious men—Thomson then received a present of twenty guiners, of which he gives this account to Mr Hill—

" I hinted

"I hinted to you in my last, that on Saturday morning I was with Sir Spencer Compton. A certain gentleman, without my desire, spoke to him concerning me, his answer was, that I had never come near him. Then the gentleman put the question, If he desired that I should wait on him? He returned, he did. On this, the gentleman gave me an introductory Letter to him. He received me in what they commonly call a civil manner; asked me some common-place questions; and made me a present of twenty guineas. I am very ready to own that the present was larger than my performance deserved, and shall ascribe it to his generosity, or any other cause, rather than the ment of the address."

The poem, which, being of a new kind, few would venture at first to like, by degrees gained upon the publick, and one edition was very speedily succeeded by another.

Thomson's credit was now high, and every day brought him new friends, among others Dr Rundle, a man afterwards unfortunately famous, sought his acquaintance, and found his qualities such, that he recommended him to the Lord Chancellor Talbot

Winter was accompanied, in many editions, not only with a preface and dedication, but with poetical praises by Mr Hill, Mr Mallet, (then Malloch), and Mira, the fictitious name of a lady once too well known. Why the dedications are, to Winter and the other Seasons, contrarily to custom.

left

left out in the collected works, the reader may

The next year (1727) he distinguished himself by three publications of "Summer, in puisuance of his plan of "A Poem on the Death of Sir Isaac "Newton, which he was enabled to perform as an exact philosopher by the instruction of Mr Gray and of "Britainia, a kind of poetical invective against the ministry, whom the nation then thought not forward enough in resenting the depredations of the Spaniards. By this piece he declared himself an adherent to the opposition, and had therefore no favour to expect from the Court

Thomson, hiving been some time entertuned in the family of the lord Binuing was desirous of testifying his gratitude by in il ing him the patron of his "Summer but the ame kindness which had first disposed lord Binning to encourage him, determined him to refuse the dedication, which was by his advice addressed to Mr Dodington, a min who had more power to advince the reputation and fortune of a poet

"Spring was published next year, with a dedication to the Countess of Hertford whose practice it was to invite every summer some poet into the country, to hear her verses, and assist her studies. This honour was one summer conferred on Thomson, who took more delight in carousing with lord Hertford and his friends than assisting her lady ship's poetical operations, and therefore never received another summons.

"Autumn, the serson to which the "Spring and "Summer are preparatory still remained unsung, Vol XI Q and and was delayed till he published (1730) his works collected.

Heproduced in 1727 the tragedy of "Sophonisha," which raised such expectation, that every rehearsal was dignified with a splendid audience, collected to anticipate the delight that was preparing for the publick. It was observed, however, that nobody was much affected, and that the company rose as from a moral lecture

It had upon the stage no unusual degree of success. Slight accidents will operate upon the taste of pleasure. There is a feeble line in the play:

O, Sophonisba, Sophonisba, O!

This gave occasion to a waggish parody.

O, Jemmy Thomson, Jemmy Thomson, O' which for a while was echoed through the town.

I have been told by Savage, that of the Prologue to "Sophonisha" the first part was written by Pope, who could not be persuaded to finish it, and that the concluding lines were added by Mallet

Thomson was not long afterwards, by the influence of Dr Rundle, sent to travel with Mr Charles Talbot, the eldest son of the Chancellor He was yet young enough to receive new impressions, to have his opinions rectified, and his views enlarged, nor can he be supposed to have wanted that currosity which is inseparable from an active and comprehensive mind He may therefore now be supposed to have revelled in all the joys of intellectual luxury; he was every day feasted with instructive novelties; he lived splendidly without expence, and might expect expect when he returned home a certain establishment

At this time a long course of opposition to Sir Robert Walpole had filled the nation with clamours for liberty, of which, no man felt the want, and with care, for liberty, which was not in danger Thomson, in his tratels on the Continent, found or fancied so many evils arising from the tyranny of other, governments, that he resolved to write a very long poem, in five parts, upon Liberty .
While he was busy on the first book, Mr Talbot died and Thomson, who had been rewarded for his attendance by the place of secretary of the Briefs, pays in the initial lines a decent tribute to his memory

Upon this great poem two years were spent, and the author congratulated lumself upon, it as his noblest work but an author and his reader are not ilways of a mind Liberty called in vain upon her votaries to read her praises, and reward her encomiast. her praises were condemned to harbour spiders, and to gather dust none of Thomson's performances were so little regarded

The judgment of the publick was not erroneou , the recurrence of the same images must tire in time an enumeration of examples; to prove a position which nobody denied, as it was from the beginning superfluous, must quickly grow disgusting

The poem of "Liberty does not now appear in its original state but, when the author's works were collected after his death, was shortened by Sir George Lyttelton, with a liberty which, as it has a manifest tendency to lessen the confidence of society, and to confound the characters of authors, by making one man write by the judgment of another, enmot be Q 2 rustified justified by any supposed propriety of the alteration, or kindness of the friend. I wish to see it exhibited as its author left it.

V

Thomson now lived in ease and plenty, and seems for a while to have suspended his poetry; but he was soon called back to labour by the death of the Chancellor, for his place then became vacant; and though the lord Hardwicke delayed for some time to give it away, Thomson's bashfulness or pinde, or some other motive perhaps not more laudable, withheld him from soliciting; and the new Chancellor would not give him what he would not ask.

He now relapsed to his former indigence; but the Prince of Wales was at that time struggling for popularity, and by the influence of Mr. Lyttelton professed himself the patron of wit; to him Thomson was introduced, and being gaily interiogated about the state of his affairs, said, "that they were "in a more poetical posture than formerly;" and had a pension allowed him of one hundred pounds a year.

Being now obliged to write, he produced (1738*) the tragedy of "Agamemnon," which was much shortened in the representation. It had the fate which most commonly attends mythological stories, and was only endured, but not favoured. It struggled with such difficulty through the first night, that Thomson, coming late to his friends with whom he was to sup, excused his delay by telling them how the sweat of his distress had so disordered his wig, that he could not come till he had been refitted by a barber.

^{*} It is not generally known that in this year an edition of Milton's Areopagitica was published by Millar, to which Thomson wrote a Preface. C.

He so interested himself in his own drama, that if I remember right, as he sat in the upper gallery, he accompanied the players by audible recitation, till a friendly hint frighted him to silence. Pope countenanced "Agamemnon, by coming to it the first night, and was welcomed to the theatre by a general clip he had much regard for Thomson, and once expressed it in a poetical epistle sent to Italy, of which however he abated the value, by transplanting some of the lines into his Epistle to "Arbuthnot"

About this time the act was passed for licensing plays, of which the first operation was the prolibition of "Gustavus Vasa, a tragedy of Mr Brooke, whom the publick recompensed by a very liberal subscription the next was the refusal of "Edward" and Eleonora," offered by Thomson It is hard to discover why either play should have been obstructed Thomson likewise endeavoured to repair his loss by a subscription, of which I cannot now tell the success

When the publick murmured at the unkind treatment of Thomson, one of the ministerial writers remarked, that "he had taken a Liberty which was not agreeable to Britannia in any Season

He was soon after employed, in conjunction with Mr Mallet, to write the masque of "Alfred, which was acted before the Prince at Chefden house

His next work (1745) was "Tancred and Signs" munda, the most successful of all his tragedies for it still keeps its turn upon the stage. It may be doubted whether he was, either by the hent of nature of habits of study, much qualified for tragedy. It does not appear that he had much sense of the patheter.

thetic, and his diffusive and descriptive style produced declamation rather than dialogue.

His friend Mi. Lyttelton was now in power, and conferred upon him the office of surveyor-general of the Leeward Islands, from which, when his deputy was paid, he received about three hundred pounds a year.

The last piece that he lived to publish was the "Castle of Indolence," which was many years under his hand, but was at last finished with great accuracy. The first canto opens a scene of lazy luxury that fills the imagination.

He was now at ease, but was not long to enjoy it; for, by taking cold on the water between London and Kew, he caught a disorder, which, with some careless exasperation, ended in a fever that put an end to his life, August 27, 1748 He was buried in the church of Richmond, without an inscription, but a monument has been erected to his memory in Westminster-abbey.

Thomson was of a statule above the middle size, and "more fat than baid beseems,' of a dull countenance, and a gross, unanimated, uninviting appearance, silent in mingled company, but cheerful among select friends, and by his friends very tenderly and warmly beloved.

He left behind him the tragedy of "Corrolanus," which was, by the zeal of his patron Sir George Lyttelton, brought upon the stage for the benefit of his family, and recommended by a Prologue, which Quin, who had long lived with Thomson in fond intimacy, spoke in such a manner as shewed him "to be," on that occasion, "no actor." The commencement of this benevolence is very honourable to Quin, who is reported to have delivered Thomson, then known to him only for his genius, from an arrest by a very considerable present and its continuance is honourable to both for friendship is not always the sequel of obligation. By this tragedy a considerable sum was raised, of which part discharged his debts,, and the rest was remitted to his sisters, whom, however removed from them by place or condition, he regarded with great tenderness, as will appear by the following Letter, which I communicate with much pleasure, as it gives me at once in opportunity of recording the fraternal kindness of Thomson, and reflecting on the friendly assistance of Mr Boswell, from whom I received it

mencement

"Hagley in Worcestershire,
October the 4th, 1747,
"My dear Sister,

"My dear Sister, "I thought you had known me better than to "merpret my silence into a decay of affection, "especially as your behaviour has always been such "as rather to increase than diminish it. Don't "imagine, because I am a bad correspondent, that "I can ever prove an unkind friend and brother." I must do my self the justice to tell you, that my affections are naturally very fixed and constant "und if I had ever reason of compluint against you "(of which by the by I have not the least shadow), "I am conscious of so many defects in my self, as dispose me to be not a httle charitable and forgiving

"It gives me the truest heartfelt satisfaction to hear you have a good, kind liusband, and are in

"easy, contented cucumstances, but were they " otherwise, that would only awaken and heighten "my tenderness towards you As our good and tender-hearted parents did not live to receive "any material testimonies of that highest human gratitude I owed them (than which nothing could " have given me equal pleasure), the only return I "can make them now is by kindness to those they left behind them. Would to God poor Lizy had " lived longer, to have been a farther witness of the "truth of what I say, and that I might have had "the pleasure of seeing once more a sister who so "truly deserved my esteem and love! But she is happy, 'while we must toil a little longer here below, let us however do it cheerfully and grate-"fully, supported by the pleasing hope of meeting "yet again on a safer shore, where to recollect the "storms and difficulties of life will not perhaps be "inconsistent with that blissful state You did right to call your daughter by her name for you "amust needs have had a particular tender friend-"ship for one another, endeated as you were by " nature, by having passed the affectionate years " of your youth together, and by that great softener " and engager of hearts, mutual hardship. That " it was in my power to ease it a little, I account " one of the most exquisite pleasures of my life. "But enough, of this melancholy, though not un-" pleasing strain.

"I esteem you for your sensible and disinterested advice to Mr. Bell, as you will see by my Letter to him, as I approve entirely of his marrying again,

-6

"you may readily ask me why I don't marry at all "My circumstances have intherto been so variable and uncertain in this fluctuating world, as induce "to keep me from engaging in such a state and "now, though they are more settled, and of late " (which you will be glad to hear) considerably im-" proved, I begin to think myself too fir advanced " in life for such youthful undertakings, not to men-" tion some other petty rea ons that are apt to startle " the delicacy of difficult old bachelors I am, how-"ever, not a little suspicions that, was I to pay a "visit to Scotland (which I have some thoughts of "doing soon), I might possibly be tempted to think of a thing not easily repaired if done mines. I have always been of opinion, that none make better " waves than the ladies of Scotland and yet, who " more forsaken than they, while the genth men are " continually running abroad all the world over? "Some of them, it is true, are wise enough to re-" turn for a wife You see I am beginning to make "interest already with the Scots ladies But no " more of this infectious subject -Pray let me hear " from you now and then and though I am not a " regular correspondent, yet perimps I may mend in that respect Remember me kindly to your hus " band, and believe me to be

" Your most affectionate brother,

"James Thomson

(Addres ed) To Mr Thom on m Lanarh

The benevolence of Thomson was fervid, but not active; he would give on all occasions what assistance his purse would supply. but the offices of intervention or solicitation he could not conquer his sluggishness sufficiently to perform. The affairs of others, however, were not more neglected than his own. He had often felt the inconveniences of idleness, but he never cured it, and was so conscious of his own character, that he talked of writing an Eastern Tale " of " the Man who loved to be in Distress."

Among his peculiarities was a very unskilful and inarticulate manner of pronouncing any lofty or solemn composition. He was once reading to Dodington, who, being himself a reader emmently elegant, was so much provoked by his odd utterance, that he snatched the paper from his hands, and told him that he did not understand his own verses

The biographer of Thomson has remarked, that an author's life is best read in his works. his observation was not well-timed Savage, who lived much with Thomson, once told me, he heard a lady remarking, that she could gather from his works three parts of his character, that he was a "great Lover, a great "Swimmer, and rigorously abstinent," but, said Savage, the knows not any love but that of the sex; he was perhaps never in cold water in his: life; and he indulges himself in all the luxury that comes within his reach. Yet Savage always spoke with the most eager praise of his social qualities, his waimth and constancy of friendship, and his adherence to his first acquaintance when the advancement of his reputation had left them behind him.

As a writer, he is entitled to one praise of the highest kind his mode of thinking, and of expressing his thought, is original. His blail verse is no more the blail verse of Milton, or of invother poet, than theirhvires of Prior are the rhivings of Cowley. His numbers, his praises his diction, are of his own growth, without transcription, without mintion. He thinks in a peculiar train, and he thinks always as a man of genius. he leads round on N iture and on Life with the eye which Nature bestoms only on a poet "the eye that distinguishes, in every thing presented to its view, whatever there is on which imagination can delight to be de anied, and with a mind that at once compaliends the vast, and attends to the minute. The reader of the "Seasons wonders that he never saw before whilat I houseon shows him, and that he never yet has felt what I homeon impresses."

His is one of the works in which "blad verse seems properly used. Thomson's wide exprusion of general views, and his drumitration of circumstantial varieties, would have been obstructed and embarraised by the frequent inter cetion of the ensity which are the necessary effects of rhyme?

His descriptions of extended scenes and general effects bring before us the whole magnificence of Nature, whether pleasing or dreadful. The glad, of Spring, the splendour of Summer, the tranquillity of Autumn, and the horror of Winter, tale in their turns possession of the mind. The poet leads is through the appearances of things as they are successively varied by the viciositudes of the year, and imports imparts to us so much of his own enthusiasm, that our thoughts expand with his imagery, and kindle with his sentiments. Nor is the naturalist without his part in the entertainment, for he is assisted to recollect and to combine, to range his discoveries, and to amplify the sphere of his contemplation.

The great defect of The Seasons is want of method; but for this I know not that there was any remedy. Of many appearances subsisting all at once, no rule can be given why one should be mentioned before another, yet the memory wants the help of order, and the curiosity is not excited by suspence or expectation.

His diction is in the highest degree florid and luxuriant, such as may be said to be to his images and thoughts "both their lustre and their shade." such as invest them with splendour, through which perhaps they are not always easily discerned. It is too exuberant, and sometimes may be charged with filling the ear more than the mind

These poems, with which I was acquainted at their first appearance, I have since found altered and enlarged by subsequent revisals, as the author supposed his judgment to grow more exact, and as books of conversation extended his knowledge and opened his prospects. They are, I think, improved in general; yet I know not whether they have not lost part of what Temple calls their "race," a word which, applied to wines in its primitive sense, means the flavour of the soil

"Liberty," when it first appeared, I tried to read, and soon desisted. I have never tried again, and and therefore will not hazard either praise or een sure

The linguist praise which he has received ought not to be suppressed it is said by Lord Lyttelton, in the Prologue to his postlimmous play, that his works contained

No line which, dving, he could wish to blot

WATTS.

HE Poems of D1 WATTS were by my recommendation inserted in the late Collection, the readers of which are to impute to me whatever pleasure or weariness they may find in the perusal of Blackmore, Watts, Pomfret, and Yalden.

ISAAC WATTS was born July 17, 1674, at Southampton, where his father, of the same name, kept a boarding-school for young gentlemen, though common report makes him a shoemaker. He appears, from the narrative of Dr Gibbons, to have been neither indigent nor illiterate

Isaac, the eldest of nine children, was given to books from his infancy; and began, we are told, to learn Latin when he was four years old, I suppose, at home He was afterwards taught Latin, Greek, and Hebrew, by Mr. Pinhorn, a clergyman, master of the Free-school at Southampton, to whom the gratitude of his scholar afterwards inscribed a Latin ode.

'His proficiency at school was so conspicuous, that a subscription was proposed for his support at the University but he declared his resolution of taking his lot with the Dissenters. Such he was as every Christian Church would rejoice to have adopted

He therefore repaired, in 1690, to in reademy taught by Mr Rowe, where he had for his companions and fellow-students Mr Hughes the poet, and Dr Horte, afterwards Archbishop of Inam Some Litin Essays, supposed to have been written as exercises at this reademy, shew a degree of I now-ledge, both philosophical and theological, such as very few attain by a much longer course of study

He way, as he hints in his Miscellanies, a maker of verses from fifteen to fifty, and in his youth he appears to have paid attention to Latin poetry. His verses to his brother, in the glyconicl measure, written when he was seventeen, are remarkably easy and elegant. Some of his other odes are deformed by the Pindarick folly their prevailing, and are written with such neglect of all inetrical rules as is without example among the ancients, but his diction, though perhaps not always exactly pine has such copious ness and splendour, as shows that he was but a very little distance from excellence

His method of study w s to impress the contents of his books upon his inemory by abridging them, and by interleaving them to amphily one system with supplements from another

With the congregation of his tutor Mr Rowe, who were, I believe, Independent, he communicated in his mucteenth year

At the age of twenty he left the academy, and spent two years in study and devotion at the house of his father, who treated him with great tenderness; and had the happiness, indulged to few parents, of living to see his son emment for literature, and venerable for piety.

He was then entertained by Sn John Hartopp five years, as a domestick tutor to his son, and in that time particularly devoted himself to the study of the Holy Scriptures; and, being chosen assistant to Dr. Chauncey, preached the first time on the birth-day that completed his twenty-fourth year, probably considering that as the day of a second nativity, by which he entered on a new period of existence.

In about three years he succeeded Dr. Chauncey, but, soon after his entrance on his charge, he was seized by a dangerous illness, which sunk him to such weakness, that the congregation thought an assistant necessary, and appointed Mr. Price. His health then returned gradually; and he performed his duty till (1712) he was seized by a fever of such violence and continuance, that from the feebleness which it brought upon him he never perfectly recovered.

This calamitous state made the compassion of his friends necessary, and drew upon him the attention of Sir Thomas Abney, who received him into his house; where with a constancy of friendship and uniformity of conduct not often to be found, he was treated for thirty-six years with all the kindness that friendship could prompt, and all the attention that respect could dictate Sir Thomas died about eight years afterwards, but he continued with the lady and her daughters to the end of his life The lady died about a year after him

A coalition like this, a state in which the notions of patronage and dependence were overpowered by the perception of reciprocal benefits, deserves a particular memorial and I will not withhold from the reader Dr. Gibbons a reprosentation to which regard is to be paid, as to the narrative of one who writes what he knows, and what is known likewise to multitudes besides.

"Our next observation shall be made upon that " remarkably kind Providence which brought the "Doctor into Sir Thomas Abneys family, and "eontinued him there till his death, a period of "no less than thirty six years In the midst of his " sacred labours for the glory of God, and good of " his generation, he is seized with a most violent and " threatening fever, which leaves him oppres ed with " great weakness, and puts a stop at least to his 1 ub " lick services for four years In this distressing sea-"son, doubly so to his active and pious spirit, he " is invited to Sir Thomas Abnev s family, nor ever " removes from it till he had finished his days Here " he emoved the uninterrupted demonstrations of the "truest friendship Here, without any care of his "own, he had every thing which could contribute " to the enjoyment of life, and favour the unwearied " pursuits of his studies Here he dwelt in a family, "which for piety, order, harmony, and every vir-" tue, was an house of God Here he had the pri-" vilege of a country recess, the fragrant bower, the " sprending lawn, the flowery guiden, and other Vol XĬ "advantages, R

" advantages, to sooth his mind and aid his restora-"tion to health; to yield him, whenever he chose "them, most grateful intervals from his laborious " studies, and enable him to return to them with "redoubled vigour and delight. Had it not been " for this most happy event, he might, as to out-"ward view, have feebly, it may be painfully, "dragged on through many more years of languor, "and mability for publick service, and even for " profitable study, or perhaps might have sunk into his grave under the overwhelming load of infir-" mities in the midst of his days; and thus the "church and world would have been deprived of "those many excellent sermons and works, which " he drew up and published during his long residence "in this family. In a few years after his coming "hither, Sir Thomas Abney dies; but his amiable " consort survives, who shews the Doctor the same " respect and friendship as before, and most happily " for him and great numbers besides, for, as her "11ches were great, her generosity and munificence "were in full proportion; her thread of life was " drawn out to a great age, even beyond that of the "Doctor's; and thus this excellent man, through " her kindness, and that of her daughter, the pre-" sent Mrs. Elizabeth Abney, who in a like degree " esteemed and honoured him, enjoyed all the benefits " and felicities he experienced at his first entrance " into this family, till his days were numbered and "finished; and, like a shock of corn in its season, " he ascended into the regions of perfect and immor-" tal life and joy."

If this quotation has appeared long, let it be considered that it comprises an account of six and-thirty years, and those the years of Dr Watts

From the time of his reception into this family, his life was no otherwise diversified than by successive publications. The series of his works I am not able to deduce their number and their variety shew the intenseness of his industry, and the extent of his capacity.

He was one of the first authors that taught the Dissenters to court attention by the graces of language Whatever they had among them before, whether of learning or acuteness, was commonly obscured and blunted by coarseness and inelegance of style He shewed them, that zeal and purity might be expressed and enforced by polished diction

He continued to the end of his life the teacher of a congregation and no reader of his works can doubt his fidelity or diligence. In the pulpit, though his low stature, which very little exceeded five feet, graced him with no advantages of appearance, yet the gravity and propriety of his utterance made his discourses very efficacious. I once mentioned the reputation which Mr Foster had gained by his proper delivery to my friend Dr Hawkesworth, who told me, that in the art of pronunciation he was far inferior to Dr Watts

Such was his flow of thoughts, and such his promptitude of language, that in the latter part of his life he did not precompose his cursory sermons, but having adjusted the heads, and sketched out some particulars, trusted for success to his extemporary powers

He did not endeavour to assist his eloquence by any gesticulations, for, as no corporeal actions have any correspondence with theological truth, he did not see how they could enforce it.

At the conclusion of weighty sentences he gave time, by a short pause, for the proper impression

To stated and publick instruction he added familiar visits and personal application, and was careful to improve the opportunities which conversation offered of diffusing and increasing the influence of religion.

By his natural temper he was quick of resentment; but by his established and habitual practice he was gentle, modest, and moffensive His tenderness appeared in his attention to children, and to the poor. To the poor, while he lived in the family of his friend, he allowed the third part of his annual ievenue, though the whole was not a hundred a year; and for children he condescended to lay aside the scholar, the philosopher, and the wit, to write little poems of devotion, and systems of instruction, adapted to their wants and capacities, from the dawn of reason through its gradations of advance in the morning of life Every man, acquainted with the common principles of human action, will look with veneration on the writer, who is at one time combating Locke, and at another making a catechism for children in their fourth year. A voluntary descent from the dignity of science is perhaps the hardest lesson that humility can teach.

As his mind was capacious, his curiosity excuisive, and his industry continual, his writings are very numerous, and his subjects various. With his theological works I am only enough acquainted to admire his meekness of opposition, and his mildness of censure. It was not only in his book, but in his mind, that or thodoxy was united with charity.

Of his philosophical pieces, his Logick has been received into the universities, and therefore wants no private recommendation if he owes part of it to Le Clerc, it must be considered that no man, who undertakes merely to methodise or illustrate a system, pretends to be its author

In his metaphysical disquisitions, it was observed by the late learned Mr Dyer, that he confounded the idea of space with that of empty space, and did not consider that though space might be without matter, yet matter being extended could not be without space

Place

Few books have been perused by me with greater pleasure than his "Improvement of the Mind, of which the radical principles may indeed be found in Lockes "Conduct of the Understanding, but they are so expended and ramified by Witts, as to confer upon him the merit of a work in the highest degree useful and pleasing. Whoever has the care of instructing others may be charged with deficience in his duty if this book is not recommended.

I have mentioned his treatises of Theology as distinct from his other productions, but the truth is, that whatever he took in hand was, by his incessant olicitude for souls, converted to Theology. As piety predominated in his mind, it is diffused over his works under his direction it may be truly stud, Theologiae Philosophia ancillatur, philosophy is subservient to evangelical instruction, it is difficult to read a page without learning, or at least wishing, to be better. The attention is caught by indirect instruction, and he that sat down only to reason is on a sudden compelled to pray.

It was therefore with great propriety that, in 1728, he received from Edinburgh and Aberdeen an unsolicited diploma, by which he became a Doctor of Divinity. Academical honours would have more value, if they were always bestowed with equal judgment.

He continued many years to study and to preach, and to do good by his instruction and example till at last the infilmities of age disabled him from the more laborious part of his ministerial functions, and, being no longer capable of publick duty, he offered to remit the salary appendant to it, but his congregation would not accept the resignation.

By degrees his weakness increased, and at last confined him to his chamber and his bed, where he was worn gradually away without pain, till he expired Nov. 25, 1748, in the seventy-fifth year of his age.

Few men have left behind such purity of character, or such monuments of laborious piety. He has provided instruction for all ages, from those who are lisping their first lessons, to the enlightened readers of Malbranche and Locke; he has left neither corporeal nor spiritual nature unexamined, he has taught the Art of Reasoning, and the Science of the Stars

His character, therefore, must be formed from the multiplicity and diversity of his attainments, rather than from any single performance; for it would not be safe to claim for him the highest rank in any single denomination of literary dignity, yet perhaps there was nothing in which he would not have excelled, if he had not divided his powers to different pursuits

As a poet, had he been only a poet, he would probably have stood high among the authors with whom he is now associated. For his judgment was exact, and he noted beauties and faults with very nice discernment his imagination, as the "Da-"cian Battle proves, was-vigorous and active, and the stores of knowledge were large by which his faney was to be supplied. His ear was well-tuned, and his diction was elegant and copious. But his devotional poetry is, like that of others, unsatisficatory. The paucity of his topicks enforces perpetual repetition, and the sanctity of the matter rejects the ornaments of figurative diction. It is sufficient for Watts to have done better than others what no man has done well

His poems on other subjects seldom rise higher than might be expected from the amusements of a Man of Letters, and have different degrees of value as they are more or less laboured, or as the occasion was more or less favourable to invention

He writes too often without regular measures, and too often in blank verse—the rhymes are not always sufficiently correspondent—He is particularly unhappy in coining names expressive of characters. His lines are commonly smooth and easy, and his thoughts always religiously pure—but who is there that, to so much piety and innocence, does not wish for a greater measure of sprightliness and vigour? He is at least one of the few poets with whom youth and ignorance may be safely pleased; and happy will be that reader whose mind is disposed, by his verses or his prose, to imitate him in all but his nonconformity, to copy his benevolence to man, and his reverence to God.

A PHILIPS

OF the birth or early part of the life of Ambross Philips I have not been able to find any account His academical education he received at St Johns College in Cambridge*, where he first solicited the notice of the world by some English verses, in the collection published by the University on the death of Queen Mary

From this time how he was employed, or in what station he passed his life, is not yet discovered. He must have published his Pastorals before the year 1708, because they are evidently prior to those of

Pope

He afterwards (1709) addressed to the universal patron, the Duke of Dorset, a "poetical Letter "from Copenhagen, which was published in the "Tatler, and is by Pope in one of lus first letters mentioned with high praise, as the production of a man "who could write very nobly

Philips was a zealous Whig and therefore easily found access to Addison and Steele but his ardour seems not to have procured him anything more than kind words; since he was reduced to translate the "Persian Tales" for Tonson, for which he was afterwards reproached, with this addition of contempt, that he worked for half-a-crown. The book is divided into many sections, for each of which if he received half-a-crown, his reward, as writers then were paid, was very liberal; but half-a-crown had a mean sound.

^{*} He took his degrees A B 1696, A M 1700 C

He was employed in promoting the principles of his party, by epitomising Hacket's "Life of Arch-"bishop Williams." The original book is written with such depravity of genius, such mixture of the fop and pedant, as has not often appeared. The epitome is fice enough from affectation, but has little spirit or vigoui*.

In 1712 he brought upon the stage "The Distrest "Mother," almost a translation of Racine's "An"dromaque." Such a work requires no uncommon powers; but the friends of Philips exerted every art to promote his interest. Before the appearance of the play, a whole "Spectator," none indeed of the best, was devoted to its praise; while it yet continued to be acted, another "Spectator" was written, to tell what impression it made upon Sir Roger; and on the first night a select audience, says Pope-, was called together to applaud it.

It was concluded with the most successful Epilogue that was ever yet spoken on the English theatre. The three first nights it was recited; twice; and not only continued to be demanded through the run, as it is termed, of the play, but whenever it is recalled to the stage, where by peculiar fortune, though a copy from the French, it yet keeps its place, the Epilogue is still expected, and is still spoken

^{*} This ought to have been noticed before—It was published in 1700, when he appears to have obtained a fellowship of St John's—C.

[|] Spence.

The propriety of Lpilogues in general, and consequently of this, was questioned by a correspondent of "The Spectator, whose Letter was undoubtedly admitted for the sake of the answer, which soon followed, written with much zeal and acrimony attack and the defence equally contributed to stimulate currosity and continue attention. It may be discovered in the defence, that Priors Epilogue to "Phædra had a little excited jealousy and something of Priors plan may be discovered in the performance of his rival Of this distinguished Epilogue the reputed author was the wretched Budgel, whom Addison used to denominate * " the man who " calls me cousin and when he was asked how such a silly fellow could write so well replied, " The " Epilogue was quite another thing when I saw it " first It was known in Tonson's family, and told to Garrick, that Addison was himself the author of it, and that, when it had been at first printed with his name, he came early in the morning, before the copies were distributed, and ordered it to be given to Budgel, that it might add weight to the solicitation which he was then making for a place

Philips was now high in the ranks of literature His play was applieded his translations from Sappho had been published in "The Spectator he was an important and distinguished associate of clubs, witty and political; and nothing was wanting to his happiness, but that he should be sure of its continuance

The work which had procured him the first notice from the publick was his Six Pastorals, which, flattering the imagination with Arcadian scenes, probably found many readers, and might have long passed as a pleasing amusement, had they not been unhappily too much commended.

The rustick poems of Theocritus were so highly valued by the Greeks and Romans, that they attracted the imitation of Vingil, whose Eclogues seem to have been considered as precluding all attempts of the same kind. for no shepherds were taught to sing by any succeeding poet, till Nemesian and Calphurnius ventured their feeble efforts in the lower age of Latin literature.

At the revival of learning in Italy, it was soon discovered that a dialogue of imaginary swams might be composed with little difficulty, because the conversation of shepherds excludes profound or refined sentiment; and, for images and descriptions, Satyrs and Fauns, and Naiads and Dryads, were always within call, and woods and meadows, and hills and rivers, supplied variety of matter, which, having a natural power to sooth the mind, did not quickly cloy it

Petraich entertained the learned men of his age with the novelty of modern Pastorals in Latin. Being not ignorant of Greek, and finding nothing in the word Eclogue of rural meaning, he supposed it to be corrupted by the copiers, and therefore called his own productions Æglogues, by which he meant to express the talk of goatherds, though it will mean only only the talk of goats This new name was adopted by subsequent writers, and amongst others by our Spenser

More than a century afterwards (1498) Mantuan published his Bucohcks with such success, that they were soon dignified by Badius with a comment, and, as Sealiger complained, received into schools, and taught as classical his complaint was vain, and the practice, however injudicious, spread fir, and continued long. Mantuan was read, at least in some of the inferior schools of this kingdom, to the beginning of the present century. The speakers of Mantuan carried their disquisitions beyond the country, to censure the corruptions of the Church, and from him Speaser learned to employ his swains on topicks of controversy.

The Italians soon trunsferred Pastoral Poetry into their own language Sannazaro wrote "Arcadia, in piose and verse Tasso and Guarini wrote "In-"vole Boschateccie, or Sylvan Dramas, and all nations of Europe filled volumes with Thyrsis and Damon, and Thestylis and Phyllis

Philips thinks it "somewhat strange to conceive how, in an age so addicted to the Muses, Pastoral "Poetry never comes to be so much as thought "upon His wonder seems very unscasonable there had never, from the time of Spenser, wanted writers to tall occasionally of Ar cadua and Strephon and half the book, in which he first tried his powers, consists of dialogues on Queen Mary's death, between Tityrus and Corydon, or Mopsus and Menalcas A series or book of Pastorals, however, I know not that any one had then lately published

Not long afterwards Pope made the first display of his powers in four Pastorals, written in a very different form. Philips had taken Spenser, and Pope took Virgil for his pattern—Philips endeavoured to be natural, Pope laboured to be elegant.

Philips was now favoured by Addison, and by Addison's companions, who were very willing to push him into reputation. The "Guardian" gave an account of Pastoral, partly critical, and partly historical; in which, when the ment of the modern is compared, Tasso and Guarini are censured for remote thoughts and unnatural refinements; and, upon the whole, the Italians and French are all eveluded from rural poetry; and the pipe of the pastoral muse is transmitted by lawful inheritance from Theoritus to Virgil, from Virgil to Spenser, and from Spenser to Philips.

With this inauguration of Philips, his rival Pope was not much delighted; he therefore drew a comparison of Philips's performance with his own, in which, with an unexampled and unequalled artifice of irony, though he has himself always the advantage, he gives the preference to Philips. The design of aggrandizing himself he disguised with such dexterity, that, though Addison discovered it, Steele was deceived, and was afraid of displeasing Pope by publishing his paper. Published however it was ("Guard. 40."): and from that time Pope and Philips lived in a perpetual reciprocation of malevolence.

In poetical powers, of either praise or satire, there was no proportion between the combatants; but Philips, though he could not prevail by wit, hoped to hurt Pope with another weapon, and charged him, as Pope thought, with Addison's approbation, as disaffected to the government

Even with this lie was not satisfied, for, indeed, there is no appearance that any regard was paid to his elamours He proceeded to grosser insults, and liung up a rod at Button's, with which he threatened to chastise Pope, who appears to have been extremely exasperated, for in the first edition of his Letters he calls Philips " raseal, and in the last still charges him with detaining in his hands the subscriptions for Homer delivered to him by the Hanover Club

I suppose it was never suspected that he meant to appropriate the money, he only delayed, and with sufficient meanness, the gratification of him by whose prosperity he was pained

Men sometimes suffer by injudicious kindness, Philips became ridiculous, without his own fault, by the absurd admiration of his friends, who decorated him with honorary garlands, which the first breath of contradiction blasted

When upon the succession of the House of Hanover every Whig expected to be happy, Philips seems to have obtained too little notice he caught few drops of the golden shower, though he did not omit what flattery could perform He was only made a Commissioner of the Lottery (1717), and, what did not much elevate his character, a justice of the Peace

The suecess of his first play must naturally dispose him to turn his hopes towards the stage he did not however soon commit himself to the mercy of an audience, but contented lumself with the fame already acquired, till after nine years he produced (1722) "The Briton, a tragedy which, whatever was its reception, is now neglected; though one of the scenes, between Vanoc the British Prince and Valens the Roman General, is confessed to be written with great dramatick skill, animated by spirit truly poetical

He had not been idle, though he had been silent; for he exhibited another tragedy the same year, on the story of "Humphry Duke of Gloucester." This tragedy is only remembered by its title.

His happiest undertaking was of a paper called "The Freethinker," in conjunction with associates, of whom one was Dr Boulter, who, then only minister of a parish in Southwark, was of so much consequence to the government, that he was made first Bishop of Bristol, and afterwards Primate of Ireland, where his prety and his charity will be long honoured.

It may easily be imagined that what was printed under the direction of Boulter would have nothing in it indecent or licentious, its title is to be understood as implying only freedom from unreasonable prejudice. It has been reprinted in volumes, but is little read, nor can impartial criticism recommend it as worthy of revival.

Boulter was not well qualified to write diurnal essays; but he knew how to practise the liberality of greatness and the fidelity of friendship. When he was advanced to the height of ecclesiastical dignity, he did not forget the companion of his labours. Knowing Philips to be slenderly supported, he took him to Ireland, as partaker of his fortune; and, making him his secretary, added such preferments,

^{*}The Archbishop's "Letters," published in 1769 (the originals of which are now in Christ Church library, Oxford.) were collected by Mr Philips C as cnabled him to represent the county of Armagh in the Irish parliament

In December 1726 he was made secretary to the Lord Chancellor and in August 1733 became judge of the Prerogative Court

After the death of his pitron he continued some years in Ireland but at list longing, is it seems, for his native country, he returned (1748) to London, having doubtless survived most of his friends and enemies, and among them his dreaded antagonist? Pope He found however the Duke of Newerstle still living, and to him he dedicated his poems collected into a volume

Having purchased in annuity of four hundred pounds, he now certainly hoped to pression years of life in plenty and tranquility but his hope deceived him he is a struck with a pilsy, and died * June 18, 1749, in his seventy eighth year.

Of his personal character all that I have heard is

Of his personal character all that I have heard is that he was eminent for bravery and skill in the sword, and that in conversation he was soleinn and pompous. He had great sensibility of censure, if judgment may be made by a single story which I heard long ago from Mr Ing, a gentleman of great eminence in Staffordshire. "Philips, said hie, "was once at "table, when I asked him, How came thy king of "Epin is to drive oven, and to say "I, m goaded on "by love! After which question he never spoke "again."

Of the "Distrest Mother" not much is pretended to be his own, and therefore it is no subject of criticism his other two tragedies, I believe, are not below mediocity, nor above it. Among the poems compused in the late Collection, the "Letter from "Denmark" may be justly praised, the Pastorals, which by the writer of the "Guardian" were ranked as one of the four genuine productions of the rustick Muse, cannot surely be despicable That they exhibit a mode of life which did not exist, noi ever existed, is not to be objected the supposition of such a state is allowed to Pastoral In his other poems he cannot be denied the praise of lines sometimes elegant; but he has seldom much force, or much comprehension. The pieces that please best are those which, from Pope and Pope's adherents, procured him the name of Namby Pamby, the poems of short lines, by which he paid his court to all ages and characters, from Walpole the "steerer of the realm," to Miss Pulteney in the nursery. The numbers are smooth and sprightly, and the diction is seldom faulty. They are not loaded with much thought, yet, if they had been written by Addison, they would have had admirers. little things are not valued but when they are done by those who can do greater.

Vol XI S cism

^{*} At his house in Hanover street and was buried in Audley chapel G

In his translations from Pindai he found the ait of reaching all the obscurity of the Theban bard, however he may fall below his sublimity; he will be allowed, if he has less fire, to have more smoke.

He has added nothing to English poetry, yet at least half his book deserves to be read perhaps he valued most himself that part which the critick would reject.

WEST

GILBERT WEST is one of the writers of whom I regret my inability to give a sufficient account the intelligence which in enquiries have obtained is general and scanty.

He was the son of the reverend Dr West perhaps * him who published "Pindar at Oxford about the he ginning of this century. His mother was sister to Sir Richard Lemple, afterwards Lord Cobham. His father, purposing to educate him for the Church, sent him first to I ton, and afterwards to Oxford, but he was seduced to a more airly mode of hife, by a commission in a troop of horse, procured him by his tincle

* Certainly han It was published in 1697 C

Hisadherence to Lord Townshendended in nothing but a nomination (May, 1729) to be clerk-extraordinary of the Privy Council, which produced no immediate profit, for it only placed him in a state of expectation and right of succession, and it was very long before a vacancy admitted him to profit.

Soon afterwards he married, and settled himself in a very pleasant house at Wickham in Kent, where he devoted himself to learning and to piety. Of his learning the late Collection exhibits evidence, which would have been yet fuller, if the dissertations which accompany his version of Pindar had not been improperly omitted. Of his piety the influence has, I hope, been extended far by his "Observations on "the Resurrection," published in 1747, for which the University of Oxford created him a Doctor of Laws by diploma (March 30, 1748), and would doubtless have reached yet further had he lived to complete what he had for some time meditated, the Evidences of the Truth of the New Testament Perhaps it may not be without effect to tell, that he read the prayers of the publick liturgy every morning to his family, and that on Sunday evening he called his servants into the parlour, and read to them first a sermon and then prayers Crashaw is now not the only maker of verses to whom may be given the two venerable names of Poet and Saint.

He was very often visited by Lyttelton and Pitt, who, when they were weary of faction and debates, used at Wickham to find books and quiet, a decent table, and literary conversation. There is at Wickham a walk made by Pitt, and, what is of far more import-importance, at Wieklam Lyttelton received that conviction which produced his "Dissertation on St Paul

These two illustrious friends had for a while listened to the blandishments of infidelity—and when West's book was published, it was bought by some who did not know his change of opinion, in expectation of new objections against Christianity—and as infidely do not want inalignity, they revenged the disappointment by calling him a Methodist

Mr West's meome was not large and his friends endeavoured, but without success, to obtain an augmentation. It is reported, that the education of the young prince was offered to him, but that he required a more extensive power of superintendance than it was thought proper to allow him

In time, however, his revenue was improved he lived to have one of the lucertive cleri ships of the Privy Council (1752) and Mr Pittat last lind it in his power to make him treasurer of Chelsea Hospital

He was now, sufficiently, rich but would name too late to be long enjoyed; nor could it seeme him from the calumities of life he lost (17.3) his only son and the year after (Much 26) a stroke of the palsy brought to the grave one of the few poets to whom the grave might be without its terrors

Of his translations I have only compared the first Olympick Ode with the original, and found my expectation surpassed, both by its elegance and its exactness. He does not confine humself to his author's train of stanzas for he saw that the difference of the languages required a different mode of versification. The first trophe is eminently happy in the second he has a little strayed from Pindar's meaning, who says, "if thou, my soul, wishest to speak of games, "look not in the desert sky for a planet hotter than "the sun, nor shall we tell of nobler games than "those of Olympia". He is sometimes too paraphrastical. Pindar bestows upon Hiero an epithet, which, in one word, signifies delighting in horses, a word which, in the translation, generates these lines.

Hiero's royal brows, whose care
Tends the courser's noble breed,
Pleas'd to nurse the pregnant mare,
Pleas'd to train the youthful steed

Pindai says of Pelops, that " he came alone in the "dark to the White Sea," and West,

Near the billow-beaten side Of the foam-besilver'd main, Darkling, and alone, he stood which however is less exuberant than the former passage.

A work of this kind must, in a minute examination, discover many imperfections; but West's version, so far as I have considered it, appears to be the product of great labour and great abilities.

His "Institution of the Gaiter" (1742) is written with sufficient knowledge of the manners that prevailed in the age to which it is referred, and with great elegance of diction, but, for want of a process of events, neither knowledge nor elegance preserve the reader from weariness

His "Imitations of Spenser" are very successfully performed, both with respect to the metre, the language, and the fiction, and being engaged at once by the excellence of the sentiments, and the artifice of the copy, the mind has two amusements together But such compositions are not to be reckoned among the great atchievements of intellect, because their effect is local and temporary they appeal not to reason or passion, but to memory, and pre suppose an neerdental or artificial state of mind. An imitation of Spenser is nothing to a reader, however acute, by whom Spenser has never been perused Works of this kind may deserve praise, as proofs of great industry, and great meety of observation but the highest praise, the praise of genius, they cannot claim. The publist beauties of art are those of which the effect is co-extended with rational nature, or at least with the whole circle of polished life, what is less than this ean be only pretty, the plaything of fashion, and the amusement of a day

THERE is in the "Adventurer" a paper of verses given to one of the authors as Mr. West's, and supposed to have been written by him. It should not be concealed, however, that it is printed with Mr. Jago's name in Dodsley's Collection, and is mentioned as his in a Letter of Shenstone's. Perhaps West gave it without naming the author, and Hawkesworth, receiving it from him, thought it his; for his he thought it, as he told me, and as he tells the publick.

COLLINS

WILLIAM COLLINS was born at Chichester, on the twenty fifth day of December, about 1720 His father was a latter of good reputation. He was in 1733, as Dr. Warton his kindly informed me, admitted scholar of Winchester College, where he was educated by Dr. Burton. His English exercises were better than his Latin.

He first courted the notice of the publish by some verses to a "Lady weeping, published in, "The "Gentleman's Magazine"

In 1740, he stood first in the list of the scholars to be received in succession at New College, but unhappily there was no vacance. This was the original misfortune of list life. He became a Commoner of Queen's College, probably with a scanty maintenace but was mabout half a year, elected a Demy of Magdalen College, where he continued till he had taken a Bachelor's degree, and then suddenly left the University for what reason I know not that he told

He now (about 1744) came to London a literary adventurer, with many projects in his liead, and very little money in his pocket. He designed many works; but his great fault was irresolution, or the frequent calls of immediate necessity broke his scheme, and suffered him to pursue no settled purpose doubtful of his dinner, or trembling at a cieditoi, is not much disposed to abstracted meditation, or remote enquiries. He published proposals for a History of the Revival of Learning; and I have heard him speak with great kindness of Leo the Tentli, and with keen resentment of his tasteless successor. But probably not a page of his history was ever writ-He planned several tragedies, but he only planned them. He wrote now and then odes and other poems, and did something, however little.

About this time I fell into his company His appearance was decent and manly, his knowledge considerable, his views extensive, his conversation elegant, and his disposition cheerful. By degrees I gained his confidence; and one day was admitted to him when he was immused by a bailiff, that was prowling in the street On this occasion recourse was had to the booksellers, who, on the credit of a translation of Aristotle's Poeticks, which he engaged to write with a large commentary, advanced as much money as enabled him to escape into the country. He shewed me the guineas safe in his hand. Soon afterwards his uncle, Mr. Martin, a heutenant-colonel, left him about two thousand pounds; a sum which Collins could scarcely think exhaustible, and which he did not live to exhaust The guineas were then repaid, and the translation neglected.

But

But man is not boin for happiness Collins, who, while he studied to live, felt no evil but poverty, no sooner lived to study than his life was assuled by more dreadful calamities, disease, and insanity

Having formerly written his character*, while perhaps it was yet more distinctly impressed upon my memory, I shall insert it here

"Mr Collins was a man of extensive literature, and of vigorous faculties. He was acquiunted not only with the learned tongues, but with the Itahan, Freneli and Spanish languiges. He had employed his mind chiefly on the works of fiction, and subjects of fancy. and, by indulging some peculiar habits of thought, was eminently delighted with those flights of imagination which pass the bounds of nature, and to which the mind is acconciled only by a passive acquiescence in popular traditions. He loved finites, genit, giants, and monsters he delighted to rove through the meanders of inchantiment, to gaze on the maginfecence of golden palaces, to repose by the water-falls of Elysani gaidens.

"This was however the character rather of his inelination than his genius, the grandeur of wildness, and the novelty of extrivagines, were always desired by him, but not always attained Xet, as diligence is never wholly lost, if his efforts sometimes caused harshness and ob emity, they hil ewise produced in happier moments sublimity and splendom. This idea which he had formed of excellence led him to our ental fictions and allegorical imagery, and perhaps,

^{*} In th Poetical Calendar a Collection of Poems by I awl e and Woty in several volumes 1763 &c C

while he was intent upon description, he did not sufficiently cultivate sentiment. His poems are the productions of a mind not deficient in fire, nor unfurnished with knowledge either of books or life, but somewhat obstructed in its progress by deviation in quest of mistaken beauties

"His morals were pure, and his opinions pious; in a long cont nuance of poverty, and long habits of dissipation, it cannot be expected that any character should be exactly uniform There is a degree of want by which the freedom of agency is almost destroyed, and long association with fortuitous companions will at last relax the strictness of truth, and abate the fervour of sincerity That this man, wise and virtuous as he was, passed almost unentangled through the snares of life, it would be prejudice and temerity to affirm, but it may be said that at least he preserved the source of action unpolluted, that his principles were never shaken, that his distinctions of right and wrong were never confounded, and that his faults had nothing of malignity or design, but proceeded from some unexpected pressure, or casual temptation.

"The latter part of his life cannot be remembered but with pity and sadness. He languished some years under that depression of mind which enchains the faculties without destroying them, and leaves reason the knowledge of right without the power of pursuing it. These clouds which he perceived gathering on his intellects, he endeavoured to disperse by travel, and passed into France, but found himself constrained to yield to his malady, and returned. He was for some time confined in a house of lunaticks, and afterwards returned.

retired to the care of his sister in Chichester, where death in 17,6 came to his relief

"After his return from I rance, the writer of this character paid him a visit it Ishington, where lie was writing for his sister, whom he had directed to meet him there was then nothing of disorder discernible, in his mind by any but himself but he had withdrawn from study, and travelled with no other book than an English Testament, such as children earry to the school when his friend tool it into his hand, out of curiosity to see what companion a Man of Letters had chosen, "I have but one book, said Collins, "but that is the best

Such was the fite of Collins, with whom I once delighted to conver e, and whom I yet remember with tenderness

He was visited at Chichester, in his last filness, by his learned friends Dr. Warton and his brother to whom he spoke with disapprobation of his Oriental Eclogues, as not sufficiently expressive of Asiatick manners, and called them his Irish Eclogues. He showed them, at the same time, an ode inscribed to Mr. John Hume, on the superstitions of the Highlands which they thought superior to his other works, but which no search has yet found.

His disorder was not aliention of mind, but general laxity and feebleness, a deficiency rather of his vital than his intellectual powers. What he spoke wanted neither judgment nor spirit, but a few minutes exhausted him, so that he was forced to rest upon the couch, till a short cessation testored his powers, and he was again able to talk with his former vigour.

^{*} It is printed in the late Collection I

The approaches of this dieadful malady he began to feel soon after his uncle's death; and, with the usual weakness of men so diseased, eagerly snatched that temporary relief with which the table and the bottle flatter and seduce. But his health continually declined, and he grew more and more burthersome to himself.

To what I have formerly said of his writings may be added, that his diction was often harsh, unskilfully laboured, and injudiciously selected. He affected the obsolete when it was not worthy of revival, and he puts his words out of the common order, seeming to think, with some later candidates for fame, that not to write prose is certainly to write poetry. His lines commonly are of slow motion, clogged and impeded with clusters of consonants. As men are often esteemed who cannot be loved, so the poetry of Collins may sometimes extort praise when it gives little pleasure.

Mr Collins's first production is added here from the "Poetical Calendar

TO MISS AURELIA C R, ON HER WEEPING AT HER SISTER'S WEDDING

Cerse, fair Aurelia, cease to mourn
Lament not Hannali s happy state
You may be happy in your turn,
And scize the treasure you regret
With Love unted Hymen stands
And softly whisper to your charms,
"Meet but your lover in my bands
"You It find your sister in his arms."

D. Y E R.

JOHN DYER, of whom I have no other account to give than his own Letters, published with Hughes correspondence, and the notes added by the editor, have afforded me, was born in 1700, the second son of Robert Dyer of Aberglasney, in Caermarthenshire, a solicitor of great capacity and note.

He passed through Westminster school under the care of Di Friend, and was then called home to be instructed in his father's profession. But his father died soon, and he took no delight in the study of the law, but having always amused himself with drawing, resolved to turn painter, and became pupil to Mr Richardson, an artist then of high reputation, but now better known by his books than by his pictures

Having studied awhile under his master, he became, as he tells his friend, an itinerant painter, and wandered about South Wales, and the parts adjacent, but he mingled poetry with painting, and about

about 1727 printed "Grongar Hill in Lewiss Miscellany

Being, probably, unsatisfied with his own proficiency, he, hi e other painters, travelled to Italy and coming back in 1740, published the "Ruins of "Rome

If his poem was written soon after his return, he did not make much use of his acquisitions in painting, whatever they might be for decline of health and love of study determined him to the Church. He therefore entered into orders and, it seems, married about the same time a lady of the name of Ensor "whose grand mother, says he, "was a Shal peare" descended from a brother of every body's Shak-"speare by her, in 1756, he had a son and three daughters hving

His ecclesiastical provision was for a long time but slender His fir t patron, Mr Harper, gave lum, in 1741, Culthorp in Leicestershire, of eighty pounds a year, on which he lived ten years, and then exchanged it for Belchford in Lincolnshire, of eventyfive His condition now began to mend In 1751, Sir John Heatheote gave him Coningsby, of one hundred and forty pounds a year and in 17,5 the Chaneellor added Kirl by, of one hundred and ten 'He complains that the repair of the house at Coningsby, and other expences, took away the profit In 1757 he published "The Fleece, his greatest poetical work, of which I will not suppress a ludicrous story Dodsley the bookseller was one day mentioning it to a critical visitor, with more expectation of success than the other could easily admit In the conversation the author's age was asked, and being repre--Vol XI sented sented as advanced in life, "He will," said the critick, "be buried in woollen."

He did not indeed long survive that publication, nor long enjoy the increase of his preferments; for in '1758 he died.

Dyer is not a poet of bulk or dignity sufficient to require an elaborate criticism. "Grongar Hill" is the happiest of his productions—it is not indeed very accurately written, but the scenes which it displays are so pleasing, the images which they raise are so welcome to the mind, and the reflections of the writer so consonant to the general sense or experience of mankind, that when it is once read, it will be read again.

The idea of the "Ruins of Rome" strikes more, but pleases less, and the title raises greater expectation than the performance gratifies. Some passages, however, are conceived with the mind of a poet; as when, in the neighbourhood of dilapidating edifices, he says,

The Pilgrim oft
At dead of night, mid his orison hears
Aghast the voice of time, disparting tow'rs,
Tumbling all precipitate down dash'd,
Ratthing around, loud thund'ring to the Moon

Of "The Fleece," which never became popular, and is now universally neglected, I can say little that is likely to recall it to attention. The woolcomber and the poet appear to me such discordant natures, that an attempt to bring them together is to couple the serpent with the fowl. When Dyer, whose mind was not unpoetical, has done his utmost, by interesting his reader in our native commodity by interspersing rural imagery, and incidental digressions, by clothing small images in great words, and by all the writers arts of delusion, the meniness naturally adhering, and the irreverence liabitually annexed to trade and manufacture, sink him under insuperable oppression and the disgust which blank verse, enembering and encumbered, superadds to an unpleasing subject, soon repels the reader, however willing to be pleased

Let me however honestly report whatever may counterbalance this weight of censure I have been told, that Akenside, who, upon a poetical question, has a right to be heard, said, "That he would re-"gulate his opinion of the reigning taste by the fate of Dyer's 'Fleece for, if that were ill received, he should not think it any longer reasonable to expect fame from excellence"

SHENSTONE.

۲.,

WILLIAM SHENSTONE, the son of Thomas Shenstone and Anne Pen, was born in November 1714, at the Leasowes in Hales-Owen, one of those insulated districts which, in the division of the kingdom, was appended, for some reason not now discoverable, to a distant county, and which, though surrounded by Warwickshire and Worcestershire, belongs to Shropshire, though perhaps thirty miles distant from any other part of it.

He learned to read of an old dame, whom his poem of the "School-mistress" has delivered to posterity; and soon received such delight from books, that he was always calling for fresh entertainment, and expected that, when any of the family went to market, a new book should be brought him, which, when it came, was in fondness carried to bed and laid by him. It is said, that, when his request had been neglected, his mother wrapped up a piece of wood of the same form, and pacified him for the night.

As he grew older, he went for a while to the Gram mar school in Hales Owen, and was placed afterwards with Mr Crumpton, an eminent school-master at Solihul, where he distinguished himself by the quickness of his progress

When he was young (June 1724) he was deprived of his father, and soon after (August 1726) of his a grandfather and was, with his brother, who died afterwards unmarried, left to the care of his grandmother, who managed the estate

From school he was sent in 1732 to Pembroke College in Oxford, a society which for half a century has been eminent for English poetry and elegant literature. Here it appears that he found delight and advantage for he continued his name in the book ten years, though he took no degree. After the first four years he put on the Civilian's gown, but without shewing any intention to engage in the profession.

About the time when he went to Oxford, the death of his grandmother devolved his affairs to the care of the reverend Mr Dolman, of Brome in Staffordshire, whose attention he always mentioned with gratitude

At Oxford he employed himself upon English poetry and in 1737 published a small Miscellany, without his name

He then for a time wandered about, to require himself with life, and was sometimes at London, sometimes at Bath, or any other place of publick resort but he did not forget his poetry. He published in 1741 his "Judgment of Hercules, addressed to

Mr Lyttelton, whose interest he supported with great warmth at an election this was next year followed by the "School-mistress"

Mr. Dolman, to whose care he was indebted for his ease and leisure, died in 1745, and the care of his own fortune now fell upon him. He tried to escape it a while, and lived at his house with his tenants, who were distantly related, but finding that imperfect possession inconvenient, he took the whole estate into his own hands, more to the improvement of its beauty, than the increase of its produce.

Now was excited his delight in rural pleasures, and his ambition of iural elegance he began from this time to point his prospects, to diversify his surface, to entangle his walks, and to wind his waters. which he did with such judgment and such fancy, as made his little domain the envy of the great, and the admiration of the skilful, a place to be visited by travellers, and copied by designers Whether to plant a walk in undulating cuives, and to place a bench at every turn where there is an object to catch the view; to make water run where it will be heard, and to stagnate where it will be seen, to leave intervals where the eye will be pleased, and to thicken the plantation where there is something to be hidden; demands any great powers of mind, I will not enperhaps a sullen and surly spectator may think such performances rather the sport than the business of human reason. But it must be at least confessed, that to embellish the form of nature is an innocent amusement, and some praise must be allowed, by the most supercilious observer, to him who does does best what such multitudes are contending to do well

This pruse was the pruse of Shenstone but, like all other modes of felicity, it was not enjoyed without its abatements. Lyttelton was his neighbour and his rival, whose empire, spacious and opulent, looked with disd up on the petty State that appeared behind it I or a while the inhabitants of Haley affected to tell their requirintance of the little fellow that was trying to make himself admired but when by degrees the Leasones forced themselves into notice, they took care to defeat the curiosity which they could not suppress, by conducting their visitants perversely to inconvenient points of view, and introllieng them at the wrong end of a walk to detect a deception juries of which Shenstone would heavily complain Where there is emulation there will be vanity where there is vanity there will be folly *

The pleasure of Shenstone was all in his eye he valued what he valued merely for its looks nothing raised his indignation more than to ask if there were any fishes in his water

^{*} This charge against the Lattetton family has been denied with some degree of warmth by Mr. I ofter and since by Mr. Craves. The latter say. The truth of the ease. I believe was that the Lattetton family went so frequently with their family to the Leasowes that they were unwilling to break in upon Mr. Shenstone's retirement on every occasion, and therefore often went to the principal point of view without waiting for any one to conduct them regularly through the whole walks. Of this Mr. Shenstone would sometimes previously complain though 1 am persuaded, he never really suspected aim ill indured intensition in his worthy, and much a dued neighbours.

His house was mean, and he did not improve it; his care was of his grounds. When he came home from his walks, he might find his floors flooded by a shower through the broken roof; but could spare no money for its reparation.

In time his expences brought clamours about him, that overpowered the lamb's bleat and the linnet's song, and his groves were haunted by beings very different from fawns and fairies. He spent his estate in adorning it, and his death was probably hastened by his anxieties. He was a lamp that spent its oil in blazing. It is said, that, if he had lived a little longer, he would have been assisted by a pension, such bounty could not have been ever more properly bestowed; but that it was ever asked is not certain, it is too certain that it never was enjoyed.

He died at the Leasowes, of a putild fever, about five on Friday morning, February 11, 1763; and was buried by the side of his brother in the church-yard of Hales-Owen.

[&]quot;MI Graves, however, expresses his belief that this is a groundless surmise "MI Shenstone," he adds, "was too much "respected in the neighbourhood to be treated with rudeness; and though his works (frugally as they were managed), added to his manner of living, must necessarily have made him exceed his meome, and, of course, he might sometimes be distressed for money, yet he had too much spirit to expose himself to insults from trifling sums, and guarded against any great distress, by anticipating a few hundreds, which his estate could very well bear, as appeared by what remained to his executors after the payment of his debts, and his legacies to his friends, and annuties of thirty pounds a year to one servant, and six pounds to another, for his will was dictated with equal justice and generously" R

He was never married, though he might have obtuined the lady, whoevershe was, to whom his 'Pas' toral Ballad was iddressed. He is represented by his friend Dodsley as a man of great tenderness and generosity, kind to all that were within his influence but, if once offended, not casily appeared, matter tive to occonomy, and careless of his expenses in his person he was larger than the middle size, with something clumsy in his form, very negligent of his clothes, and remail able for wearing his grey hair in a particular manner for he held that the fishion was no rule of dress, and that every man was to sint his appearance to his natural form.*

His mind was not very comprehensive, nor his curiosity active he had no value for those parts of I nowledge which he had not himself cultivated

His hic was unstained by any crime the Elegy on Jesse, which has been supposed to relate an unfor tunate and criminal amour of his own, was known by his friends to have been suggested by the story of Miss Godfrey in Richardson's "Pamela

What Gry thought of his character, from the perusal of his Letters, was this

"I have read too an octave volume of Shenstone's
"Letters Poor man! he was always wishing for "money, for fime, and other distinctions and "his whole philosophy consisted in hving against his

^{*} There as Mr Grives were not piecesely his sentiments, though he thought right enough, that every one should in some degree, con ult, his particular shape and complexion in adjusting his dress, and that no falmon ought to anciff what was ungraceful ab unl or really deformed.

"will in retirement, and in a place which his taste had adorned, but which he only enjoyed when people of note came to see and commend it; his correspondence is about nothing else but this place and his own writings, with two or three neighbouring clergymen, who wrote verses too."

His poems consist of elegies, odes, and ballads, humorous sallies, and moral pieces.

His conception of an Elegy lie has in his Preface very judiciously and discriminately explained. It is, according to his account, the effusion of a contemplative mind, sometimes plaintive, and always serious, and therefore superior to the glitter of slight ornaments. His compositions suit not ill to this description. His topicks of praise are the domestick virtues, and his thoughts are pure and simple; but, wanting combination, they want variety. The peace of solitude, the innocence of mactivity, and the unenvied security of an humble station can fill but a few pages. That of which the essence is uniformity will be soon described. His Elegies have therefore too much resemblance of each other.

The lines are sometimes, such as Elegy requires, smooth and easy, but to this praise his claim is not constant, his diction is often harsh, improper, and affected, his words ill-coined, or ill-chosen, and his phrase unskilfully inverted

The Lynck Poems are almost all of the light and any kind, such as trip lightly and nimbly along, without the load of any weighty meaning. From these, however, "Rural Elegance" has some right to be excepted. I once heard it praised by a very learned lady, and though the lines are irregular, and the thoughts thoughts diffused with too much verbosity, yet it cannot be denied to contain both philosophical argument and poetical spirit

Of the rest I cannot think any excellent the "Skylark pleases me best, which has however more of the epigram than of the ode

But the four parts of his "Pastoral Ballad demand particular notice I cannot but regret that it is pastoral an intelligent reader, acquainted with the scenes of real life, sickens at the mention of the ci ooh, the pipe, the sheep, and the lids, which it is not necessary to bring forward to notice, for the poets art is selection, and he ought to shew the beauties without the grossness of the country life. His stanza seems to have been chosen in imitation of Rowes "Despairing Shenlierd"

In the first part are two passages, to which if any mind denies its sympathy, it has no acquaintance with love or nature

I priz d every hour that went by,

Beyond all that had pleas dime before,
But now they are past and I sigh,

And I grieve that I priz d them no more

When fore d the fair nymph to forego,
What anguish I felt in my heart!
Yet I thought (but it might not be so)
Twas with pain that she saw me depart

She gaz d, as I slowly withdrew,
My path I could hardly discern,
So sweetly she bade me adicu,
I thought that she bade me return

In the second this passage has its pictiness, though it be not equal to the former

I have found out a gift for my fair,

I have found where the wood-pigeous breed,
But let me that plunder forbear,

She will say 'twas a barbarous deed

For he ne'er could be time, she averi'd,
Who could tob a poor bird of its young,
And I lov'd her the more when I heard
Such tenderness fall from her tongne

In the third he mentions the common-places of amorous poetry with some address:

'Tis his with mock passion to glow!

'Tis his in smooth tales to unfold,

How her face is as bright as the snow,

And her bosom, be sure, is as cold,

How the nightingales labour the strain,
With the notes of this charmer to vie,
How they vary their accents in vain,
Repine at her triumphs and die.

In the fourth I find nothing better than this natural strain of Hope:

Alas! from the day that we met,
What hope of an end to my woes,
When I cannot endure to forget
The glance that undid my repose?

Yet Time may diminish the pain
The flower, and the shrub, and the tice,
Which I rai'd for her pleasure in vain,
In time may have comfort for me.

His "Levities are by their title exempted from the severities of eriticism yet it may be remarked in a few words, that his humour is sometimes gross, and seldom sprightly

Of the Moral Poems the first is the "Choice of "Hercules, from Xenophon The numbers are smooth, the diction elegant, and the thoughts just but something of vigour is still to be wished, which it might have had by brevity and compression "Fate of Deliency has an air of griety, but not a very pointed and general moral His blank verses, those that can read them may probably find to be like the blank verses of his neighbours "Love and "Honour is derived from the old ballad, " Did " you not hear of a Spanish Lady? -I wish it well enough to wish it were in rhyme

The "School mistress," of which I know not what claim it has to stand among the Moral Works, is surely the most pleasing of Shenstone's performances The adoption of a particular style, in light and short compositions, contributes much to the increase of pleasure we are entertuned at once with two imitations, of nature in the sentiments, of the original author in the style, and between them the mind is I ept in perpeturi employment

The general recommendation of Shenstone is casiness and simplicity, his general defect is want of comprehension and variety Had his mind been better stored with knowledge, whether he could have been great, I I now not he could certainly have been agreeable

Y O U N G.

THE following life was written, at my request, by a gentleman who had better information than I could easily have obtained; and the publick will perhaps wish that I had solicited and obtained more such favours from him '.

"DEAR SIR,

"In consequence of our different conversations about authentick materials for the Life of Young, I send you the following detail

"Of great men, something must always be said to gratify currosity. Of the illustrious author of the "Night Thoughts" much has been told of which there never could have been proofs, and little care appears to have been taken to tell that, of which proofs, with little trouble, might have been procured"

EDWARD YOUNG was born at Upham, near Winchester, in June 1681. He was the son of Edward Young, at that time fellow of Winchester

⁷ See Gent Mag vol. LXX. p 225. N.

College and rector of Upham who was the son of Jo Young of Woodha in Berkshire, styled by Wood, gentleman In September 1682 the Poets father was collited to the prebend of Gillinghian Minor, in the church of Sarnin, by bishop Ward When Ward's faculties were impured through age, his duties were necessarily performed by others We learn from Wood, that, at a visitation of Sprat . July the 12th, 1686, the prebendary preached a Latin sermon, afterwards published, with which the bishop was so pleased, that he told the chapter he was concerned to find the preacher had one of the worst prebends in their church. Some time after this, in consequence of his merit and reputation, or of the interest of Lord Bradford, to whom, in 1702, he dedicated two volumes of sermons, he was appointed chaplain to King William and Queen Mary, and preferred to the demory of Sarum Jacob, who wrote in 1720, says, " he was chaplain and clerk of "the closet to the late Queen, who honoured him " by standing godinother to the Pout His fellowship of Winchester he resigned in favour of a gentleman of the name of Harris, who married his only daughter The dean died at Saruin, after a short illness, in 1705 in the sixty third year of his age On the Sunday after his decease Bishop Burnet preached at the cathedral, and began his sermon with saying, "Death has been of late walling round us, " ind maling breach upon breach upon us, and has "now earned away the head of this body with a "stroke, so that he, whom you saw a week ago " distributing the holy mysteries, is now had in the "dust But he still lives in the many excellent di " rections

"rections he has left us, both how to live and how "to die"

The Dem placed his son upon the foundation at Winchester College, where he had himself been educated. At this school Edward Yeang remained till the election after his eighteenth birth-day, the period at which those upon the foundation are superanniated. Whether he did not betray his abilities early in life, or his masters had not skill enough to discover in their pupil any marks of genus for which he mented reward, or no vacancy at Oxford offered them an opportunity to bestow upon him the reward provided for ment by William of Wykeliam; certain it is, that to an Oxford fellowship our poet did not succeed. By chance, or by choice, New College cannot claim the honour of numbering among its fellows him who wrote the "Night Thoughts."

On the 13th of October, 1703, he was entered an independent member of New College, that he might live at little expence in the Warden's lodgings, who was a particular friend of his father's, till he should be qualified to stand for a fellowship at All In a few months the Warden of New College died He then removed to Corpus College. The president of this society, from regard a'so for his father, invited him thither, in order to lessen his academical expences. In 1708, he was nominated to a law-fellowship at All Souls by Archbishop Tenison, into whose hands it came by devolution Such repeated patronage, while it justifies Burnet's praise of the father, reflects credit on the conduct of the son. The manner in which it was excited seems to prove, that the father did not leave behind much wealth.

On the 23d of April, 1714, Young took his degree of bachclor of end liws, and his doctors degree on the 10th of June, 1719

Soon after he went to Oxford, he discovered, it is said, an inclination for pupils Whether he ever commenced tutor is not known None has hitherto boasted to have received his academical instruction from the author of the "Night Thoughts

It is probable that his College was proud of him no less as a scholar than as a poet, for in 1716, when the foundation of the Codring on Labrary was laid, two years after he had taken his bachelor's degree, I oung was appointed to speak the Latin oration. This is at least particular for being dedicated in English. I o the I adies of the Codrington I annily. To the cladies he says, "that he was unavoidably flung "into a singularity, by being obliged to write an "epistle dedicatory void of common place, and such "a one was never published before by any author whatever that this practice absolved them from any obligation of reading what was pre-ented to "them and that the bookseller approved of it, becomes it would make people stare, was absurd "enough, and perfectly right."

Of this oration there is no appearance in his own edition of his works and prefixed to an edition by Curli and Tonson, 1741, is a letter from Young to Curli, if we may credit Curli, dated December the 9th, 1739, wherein he says, that he has not let sure to review what he formerly wrote, and adds, "I have not the 'Epistle to Lord Lansdowne If "you will take my advice, I would have you omit Vol. "I hat."

"that, and the oration on Codrington. I think the collection will sell better without them"

There are who relate, that, when first Young found himself independent, and his own master at All Souls, he was not the ornament to religion and morality which he afterwards became

The authority of his father, indeed, had ceased, some time before, by his death, and Young was certainly not ashamed to be patronized by the infamous Whartor. But Wharton befriended in Young, perhaps, the poet, and particularly the tragedian. If virtuous authors must be patronized only by virtuous peers, who shall point them out?

Yet Pope is said by Ruffhead to have told Warbuiton, that "Young had much of a subline genius, though without common sense, so that his genius, having no ginde, was perpetually hable to degenerate into hombast. This made him pass a foolish youth, the sport of peers and poets: but his having a very good heart enabled him to support the clerical character when he assumed it, first with decency, and afterwards with honour."

They who think ill of Young's morality in the early part of his life, may perhaps be wrong, but Tindal could not err in his opinion of Young's warmth and ability in the cause of religion. Tindal used to spend much of his time at All Souls. "The "other boys," said the Atheist, "I can always answer, because I always know whence they have "their arguments, which I have read a hundred "times: but that fellow Young is continually pestering me with something of his own "."

* As my great friend is now become the subject of biography, it should be told, that, every time I called upon Johnson during

After all, Tindal and the eensurers of Young may be reconcileable. Young might, for two or three years, have tried that kind of life, in which his natural principles would not suffer him to wallow long If this were so, he has left behind him not only his evidence in favour of viitue, but the potent testimony of experience against vice

We shall soon see that one of his earliest productions was imore serious than what comes from the generality of unfledged poets

Young perhaps ascribed the good fortune of Addison to the "Poem to his Majesty, presented, with a copy of verses; to Somers and hoped that he also might soar, to wealth and 'honour on wings of the same kind His first poetical flight was when Queen Anne called up to the House of Lords the sons of the Earls of Northampton and Aylesbury, and added, in one day, ten others to the number of peers. In order to reconcile the people to one, at least, of the new, lords, he published, in 1712, "An Epistle to the Right Honourable George Lord "Lansdowne! In this composition the poet pours out his panegyrick, with the extravagance of a young man, who thinks his present stock of wealth will never be exhausted."

The poem seems intended also to reconcile the publick to the late peace. This is endeavoured to be done by shewing ithat men are slain in war, and the time I was employed in collecting materials for this lift and putting it together, he never suffered me to depart without some such farewell as this 'Don't forget that rascal Tindal Sir that in peace "harvests wave, and Commerce swells "her sail." If this be humanity, for which he meant it, is it politicks? Another purpose of this epistle appears to have been, to prepare the publick for the reception of some tragedy he might have in hand. His lordship's patronage, he says, will not let him "repent his passion for the stage," and the particular praise bestowed on "Othello" and "Oroonoko" looks as if some such character as Zanga was even then in contemplation. The affectionate mention of the death of his friend Harrison of New College, at the close of this poem, is an instance of Young's art, which displayed itself so wonderfully some time afterwards in the "Night Thoughts," of making the publick a party in his private sorrow.

Be sure to hang up the Alheist. Alluding to this anecdote, which Johnson had mentioned to me

Should justice call upon you to censure this poem, it ought at least to be remembered that he did not insert it in his works; and that in the letter to Curll, as we have seen, he advises its omission. The booksellers, in the late body of English Poetry, should have distinguished what was deliberately rejected by the respective authors*. This I shall be careful to do with regard to Young. "I think," says he, "the "following pieces in four volumes to be the most "excusable of all that I have written; and I wish "less apology was needful for these. As there is no "recalling what is got abroad, the pieces here re-"published I have revised and corrected, and ren-"dered them as pardonable as it was in my power to do."

^{*} Dr Johnson, in many cases, thought and directed differently, particularly in Young's Works. J. N.

Shall the gates of repentance be shut only against literary sinners?

When Addison published "Cato in 1713, Young had the honour of prefixing to it a recommendatory copy of verses This is one of the pieces which the author of the "Night Thoughts did not republish On the appearance of his "Poem on the Last Day,"

Addison did not return Young's compliment but "The Englishman of October 29, 1713, which was probably written by Addison, speaks liandsomely of this poem The "Last Day" was published soon after the peace The vice chancellor's imprimatur, for it was printed at Oxford, is dated May the 19th 1713 From the exordium Young appears to have spent some time on the composition of it While other bards " with Britain's hero set their souls on "fire," he draws, he says, a deeper seene borough had been considered by Britain as her hero but, when the "Last Day was published, female cabal had blasted for a time the laurels of Blenheim This serious poem was finished by Young as early as 1710, before he was thirty for part of it is printed in the "Tatler * It was inscribed to the Queen, in a dedication, which, for some reason, he did not admit into his works It tells her, that his only title to the great honour he now does himself, is the obligation which he formerly received from her royal ındulgence

Of this obligation nothing is now known, inness he alluded to her being his godmother. He is said indeed to have been engaged at a settled stipend as a writer for the Court. In Swifts "Rhapsody on Poetry are these lines, speaking of the Court."

^{1} Not in the Tatler, but in the Guardian, May 9, 1713 C Whence

Whence Gay was banish'd in disgrace,
Where Pope will never show his face,
Where Y must torture his invention
To flatter knaves, or lose his pension.

That Y means Young seems clear from four other lines in the same poem:

Attend, ye Popes and Youngs and Gays, And tune your harps and strew your bays, Your panegyricks here provide, You cannot err on flattery's side

Yet who shall say with certainty, that Young was a pensioner? In all modern periods of this country, have not the writers on one side been regularly called Hirelings, and on the other Patriots?

Of the Dedication the complexion is clearly political. It speaks in the highest terms of the late peace; it gives her Majesty praise indeed for her victories, but says, that the author is more pleased to see her rise from this lower world, soaring above the clouds, passing the first and second heavens, and leaving the fixed stars behind her, nor will he lose her there, he says, but kee, her still in view through the boundless spaces on the other side of Creation, in her journey towards eternal bliss, till he behold the heaven of heavens open, and 'angels receiving and conveying her still onward from the stretch of his imagination, which tires in her pursuit, and fa'ls back again to earth.

The Queen was soon called away from this lower world, to a place where human praise or human flattery, even less general than this, are of little consequence. If Young thought the dedication contained only the praise of truth, he should not have omitted it in his works Was he conscious of the exaggeration of party? Then he should not have written

tion of party? Then he should not have written it The poem itself is not without a glance towards politicles, notwithstanding the subject. The cry that the Church was in danger, had not yet subsided. The "Last Day, written by a layman, was much approved by the ministry, and their friends.

Before the Queen's death, "The Force of Rehugion, or Vanquished Love, was sent into the world. This poem is founded on the execution of Lady Jane Grey and her husband. Lord Guildford, 1504, a story chosen for the subject of a tragedy by Edmund Smith, and wrought into a tragedy by Rowe. The dedication of it to the Counters of Salishur does not appear in his our edition. He hopes bury does not appear in his own edition He hopes it may be some excuse for his presumption, that the story could not have been read without thoughts of the Countess of Salisbury, though it had been dedi-cited to another "To behold, he proceeds, "a" "person only virtuous, stirs in us a prudent regret,
"to behold a person only amable to the sight, "warms us with a religious indignation but to turn our eyes to a Countess of Salisbury, gives us plea"sure and improvement it works a sort of miricle, " occasions the bias of our nature to fall off from " sin, and makes our very senses and affections con-" verts to our religion, and promoters of our duty ' His flattery was as ready for the other sex as for ours, and was at least as well adapted

August the 27th, 1714, Pope writes to his friend Jarvas, that he is just arrived from Oxford that every one is much concerned for the Queen's death, but that no panegyricks are ready yet for the King

Nothing

Nothing like friendship had yet taken place between Pope and Young for, soon after the event which Pope mentions, Young published a poem on the Queen's death, and his Majesty's accession to the throne. It is inscribed to Addison, then secretary to the Lords Justices. Whitever were the obligations which he had formerly received from Anne, the poet appears to aim at something of the same sort from George. Of the poem the intention seems to have been, to shew that he had the same extravagant strain of praise for a king as for a queen. To discover, at the very onset of a foreigner's reign, that the Gods bless his new subjects in such a king, is something more than praise. Neither was this deemed one of his excusable pieces. We do not find it in his works.

Young's father had been well acquainted with Lady Anne Wharton, the first wife of Thomas Wharton, Esq. afterwards Marquis of Wharton; a lady celebrated for her poetical talents by Burnet and by Waller.

To the Dean of Sarum's visitation sermon, already mentioned, were added some verses "by that excel"lent poetess Mrs. Anne Wharton," upon its being translated into English, at the instance of Waller, by Atwood. Wharton, after he became ennobled, did not drop the son of his old friend. In him, during the short time he lived, Young found a pation, and in his dissolute descendant a friend and a companion. The Marquis died in April, 1715. In the beginning of the next year the young Marquis set out upon his travels, from which he returned in about a twelvemonth. The beginning of 1717 carried him to Ireland, where, says the Biographia, "on the score of "his

is this extraordinary qualities, he had the honour "done him of being admitted, though under age, " to take his seat in the House of Lords

With this unhappy character, it is not unlikely that Young went ito Ireland From his Letter to Richardson on "Original Composition, it is clear he was, at some period of his life, in that country "I "remember, says he, in that letter, speaking of Swift, "as I and others were taking with him an "evening walk," about a nulei out of Dublin, he "stopped short we passed on that perceiving he did not follow its, I went back and found him fixed as a statue and earnestly gizing upward at "a noble elm, which in its uppermost branches was "much withered and decayed Pointing at it, he said, 'I shall be like that tree, I shall die at top Is it not probable, that this visit to Ireland was paid when he had an opportunity of going thither with his avowed friend and patron ">

From "The Englishman it appears that a tragedy by Young was in the theatre so early as 1713 Yet "Busins was not brought upon Drury Line Stage till 1719 It was insertibed to the Duke of Newcastle, "because the late instances he had re "ceived of his Grace's undeserved and uncommon "favour, in an affair of some consequence, foreign "to the theatre, had taken from him the privilege of "chusing a patron" The dedication he afterwards suppressed

* See a letter from the Duke of Wharton to Swift dated 1717 in Swift's Works, in which he mentions Young being then in Ire land 4 J B N

"Busins" was followed in the year 1721 by "The Revenge." He dedicated this famous tragedy to the Duke of Wharton. "Your Grace," says the dedication, "has been pleased to make yourself accessary to "the following scenes, not only by suggesting the "most beautiful incident in them, but by making "all possible provision for the success of the whole."

That his Grace should have suggested the incident to which he alludes, whatever that incident might have been, is not unlikely. The last mental exertion of the superannuated young man, in his quarters at Leida, in Spain, was some scenes of a tragedy on

the story of Mary Queen of Scots

Diyden dedicated "Marriage à la Mode" to Wharton's infamous relation Rochester, whom he acknowledges not only as the defender of his poetry, but as the promoter of his fortune. Young concludes his address to Wharton thus "My present fortune is "his bounty, and my future his care, which I will "venture to say will be always remembered to his "honour, since he, I know, intended his generosity "as an encouragement to merit, though through his " very pardonable partiality to one who bears him so " sincere a duty and respect, I happen to receive the " benefit of it." That he ever had such a patron as Wharton, Young took all the pains in his power to conceal from the world, by excluding this dedication from his works. He should have remembered that he at the same time-concealed his obligation to ${f W}$ harton for the most beautiful incident in what is surely not his least beautiful composition The passage just quoted is, in a poem afterwards addressed to Walpole, literally copied:

Be this thy partial smile from consure free 1 Twas meant for ment, though it fell on me

While Young, who, in his "Love of Tame," complains grievously how often "dedications wash "an Æthiop white, was painting an amiable Duke of Wharton in perishable prose, Pope was, perlips, beginning to describe the "scorn and wonder of his "days in lasting verse

To the patronage of such a character, had Young studied men as much as Pope, he would have known how little to have trusted Young, however, was certainly indebted to it for something material and the Duke's regard for Young, added to his "Lust" of praise," procured to All Soul's College a donation, which was not forgotten by the poet when he dedicated "The Revenge"

It will surprise you to see me citc second Atkins, Case 136, Stiles versus the Attorney General, March 14, 1740, as authority for the life of a poct. But biographers do not always find such cert in guides as the oaths of the persons whom they record. Chancellor Hardwicke was to determine whether two annuities, granted by the Duke of Wharton to Young, were for legal, considerations. One was dated the 24th of March, 1719, and accounted for his Graces bounty in a style princely and commendable, if not legal—" considering that the publick good is ad-"vanced by the encouragement of léarning and the polite arts, and being pleased therein with the atmetis of Dr. Young, in consideration thereof, and of the love I bear him, &c. The other was dated the 10th of July, 1722

"Busins" was followed in the year 1721 by "The "Revenge" He dedicated this famous tragedy to the Duke of Wharton. "Your Grace," says the dedication, "has been pleased to make yourself accessary to "the following scenes, not only by suggesting the most beautiful incident in them, but by making "all possible provision for the success of the whole."

That his Grace should have suggested the incident to which he alludes, whatever that incident might have been, is not unlikely. The last mental exertion of the superannuated young man, in his quarters at Leiida, in Spain, was some scenes of a tragedy on the story of Mary Queen of Scots.

Diyden dedicated "Marriage à la Mode" to Wharton's infamous relation Rochester, whom he acknowledges not only as the defender of his poetry, but as the promoter of his fortune. Young concludes his address to Whaiton thus "My present fortune is "his bounty, and my future his care, which I will "venture to say will be always remembered to his " honour, since he, I know, intended his generosity " as an encouragement to merit, though through his "very pardonable partiality to one who bears him so " sincere a duty and respect, I happen to receive the "benefit of it." That he ever had such a patron as Wharton, Young took all the pains in his power to conceal from the world, by excluding this dedication from his works He should have remembered that he at the same time concealed his obligation to Wharton for the most beautiful incident in what is surely not his least beautiful composition The passage just quoted is, in a poem afterwards addressed to Walpole, literally copied:

Be this thy partial smile from eensure free target as meant for ment, though it fell on me

While Young, who, in his "Love of Tame," complains greeously how often "dedications wash "an Æthiop white, was painting an amable Duke of Wharton in penshable prose, Pope was, perhaps, beginning to describe the "scorn and wonder of his "days in lasting verse

To the patronage of such a character, had Young studied men as much as Pope, he would have known how little to have trusted. Young, however, was certainly indebted to it for something material, and the Duke's regard for Young, added to his "Lust" of praise," procured to All Soul's College a donation, which was not forgotten by the poet when he dedicated "The Revence

It will surprise you to see me eite second Atkins, Case 136, Stiles versus the Attorney General, March 14, 1740, as authority for the life of a poet biographers do not always find such certain guides as the oaths of the persons whom they record Chaneellor Hardwicke was to determine whether two annuities, granted by the Duke of Wharton to Young. were for legal considerations. One was dated the 24th of March, 1719, and accounted for his Grace's bounty in a style princely and commendable, if not legal-" considering that the publick good is ad-" vanced by the encouragement of learning and the " polite arts, and being pleased therein with the at-" tempts of Dr Young, in consideration thereof. " and of the love I bear him, &c The other was dated the 10th of July, 1722

Young, on his examination, swore that he quitted the Exeter family, and refused an annuity of 100l. which had been offered him for life if he would continue tutor to Lord Burleigh, upon the pressing solicitations of the Duke of Wharton, and his Grace's assurances of providing for him in a much more ample manner. It also appeared that the Duke had given him a bond for 600l dated the 15th of March, 1721, in consideration of his taking several journeys, and being at great expences, in order to be chosen member of the House of Commons, at the Duke's desire, and in consideration of his not taking two livings of 200l and 400l. in the gift of All Souls College, on his Grace's promises of serving and advancing him in the world.

Of his adventures in the Exeter family I am unable to give any account. The attempt to get into Pailiament was at Cirencester, where Young stood a contested election. His grace discovered in him talents for oratory as well as for poetry. Nor was this judgment wrong. Young, after he took orders, became a very popular preacher, and was much followed for the grace and animation of his delivery. By his oratorical talents he was once in his life, according to the Biographia, deserted. As he was preaching in his turn at St. James's, he plainly perceived it was out of his power to command the attention of his audience. This so affected the feelings of the preacher, that he sat back in the pulpit, and burst into teais. But we must pursue his poetical life

In 1719 he lamented the death of Addison, in a Letter addressed to their common friend Tickell. For the e secret history of the following lines, if they conin any, it is now vain to seck

In joy once join d, in sorrow, now, for years-Partner in grief, and brother of my tears, Tickell, accept this verse, thy mournful due

From your account of Tickell it appears that he nd Young used to "communicate to each other whatever verses they wrote, even to the least things "

In 1719 appeared a "Paraphrase on Part of the Book of Job Parker, to whom it is dedicated, and not long by means of the seals, been qualified? or a patron Of this work the author's opinion nay be known from his Letter to Curll " You seem, in the Collection you propose, to have omitted what I think may claim the first place in it, I mean 'a Translation from Part of Job printed by Mr Tonson The Dedication, which was only suffered to appear in Mr Tonson's edition, while it speaks with satisfaction of his present retirement, seems to make an unusual struggle to escape from retirement. But every one who sings in the dark does not sing from joy It is addressed, in no common strain of flattery, to a chancellor, of whom he clearly appears to have had no kind of knowledge

Of his Satires it would not have been possible to fix the dates without the assistance of first editions, which, as you had occasion to observe in your account of Dryden, are with difficulty found must then have referred to the poems, to discover when they were written For these internal hotes of time we should not have referred in vain. The first Satire laments, that "Guilt's chief foc in Addison is "fled." The second, addressing himself, asks,

Is thy ambition sweating for a rhyme, Thou unambitious fool, at this late time? A fool at forty is a fool indeed

The Satires were originally published separately in folio, under the title of "The Universal Passion" These passages fix the appearance of the first to about 1725, the time at which it came out. As Young seldom suffered his pen to dry, after he had once dipped it in poetry, we may conclude that he began his Satires soon after he had written the "Paraphrase on Job." The last Satire was certainly finished in the beginning of the year 1726. In December 1725, the King, in his passage from Helvoetsluys, escaped with great difficulty from a storm by landing at Rye; and the conclusion of the Satire turns the escape into a miracle, in such an encomiastick strain of compliment as Poetry too often seeks to pay to Royalty.

From the sixth of these poems we learn,

Midst empire's charms, how Carolina's heart Glow'd with the love of virtue and of art

since the grateful poet tells us, in the next couplet,

Her favour is diffus'd to that degree, Excess of goodness! it has dawn'd on me.

Her Majesty had stood godmother, and given her name, to the daughter of the lady whom Young married married in 1731 and had perhaps shown some attention to Lady Elizabeth's future husband

The fifth Sittre, "On Women, was not published till 1727 and the sixth not till 1728

To these poems, when, in 1728, he gathered them into one publication, he prefixed a Preface in which he observes, that " no man can converse " much in the world, but at what he meets with he " must either be insensible or grieve, or be angry or " smile Now to smile at it, and turn it into ridi-" eule," he adds, " I thinh most eligible, as it hurts " ourselves least, and gives vice and folly the greatest offence Laughing at the misconduct of the world "will, in a great measure, case us of any more dis-agreeable passion about it One passion is more "effectually driven out by another than by reason, "whatever some teach So wrote, and so of course thought, the lively and witty Satirist at the grave age of almost fifty, who, many years carlier in life, wrote "The Last Day': After all, Swift pronounced of these Satires, that they should either have been more angry or more merry

Is it not somewhat singular that Young preserved, without any palliation, this Preface, so bluntly decisive in favour of laughing at the world, in the same collection of his works which contains the mournful, angry, gloomy, "Night I houghts t'

At the conclusion of the Prefice he applies Plates beautiful fable of "The Birth of Love to modern poetry, with the addition, "thatiPoetry, lile Love, "is a little subject to blindness, which makes her "mistake her way to preferments and honours" and "that she retains a dutiful admiration of her fathers "family."

.. 13

"family, but divides her favours, and generally "lives with her mother's relations." Poetry, it is tiue, did not lead Young to preferments or to honours, but was there not something like blindness in the flattery which he sometimes forced her, and her sister Prose, to utter? She was always, indeed, taught by him to entertain a most dutiful admination of riches; but surely Young, though nearly related to Poetry, had no connexion with her whom Plato makes the mother of Love That he could not well complain of being related to Poveity appears clearly from the frequent bounties which his gratitude records, and from the wealth which he left behind him. By "The Universal Passion" he acquired no vulgar fortune more than three thousand pounds A considerable sum had already been swallowed up in the South Sea. For this loss he took the vengeance of an author His Muse makes poetical use more than once of a South Sea Dream.

It is related by Mi. Spence, in his Manuscript Anecdotes, on the authority of Mr. Rawlinson, that Young, upon the publication of his "Universal" Passion," ieceived from the Duke of Grafton two thousand pounds, and that, when one of his friends exclaimed, "Two thousand pounds for a poem" he said it was the best bargain he ever made in his life, for the poem was worth four thousand.

This story may be true, but it seems to have been raised from the two answers of Lord Burghley and Sir Philip Sidney in Spenser's Life.

After inscribing his Satires, not perhaps without the hopes of preferment and honours, to such names as the Duke of Doiset, Mr. Dodington, Mr.

Spencer

Spencer Compton, Ladv Elizabeth Germaine, and Sir Robeit Walpole, he returns to plain pringy rick In 1726 he addressed a poem to Sir Robert Walpole, of which the title sufficiently explains the intention If Young must be acknowledged a rendy celebrator, he did not endeavour, or did not thoose, to be a lasting one "The Instalment is among the pieces he did not admit into the number of his ercusable writings". Yet it contains a couplet which pretends to pant after the power of bestowing immortality.

Oh! how I long, enkindled by the theme, "I have been a deep eternity to launch thy name!"

The bounty of the former raign seems to have been continued, possibly increased, in this ' Whatever it might have been, the poet thought he deserted it for he was not ashamed to acknowledge what, without his acknowledgement, would now perhaps never have been known

My breast, O Walpole, glows with grateful fire The streams of royal bounty, turn d by thee, Refresh the dry domains of poesy

If the purity of modern putriotism will term Young a pensioner, it must at least be confessed he was a grateful one!

The reign of the new monarch was ushered in by Young with "Ocean, an Ode The lint of it was taken from the royal speech, which recommended the increase and the encouragement of the seamen that they might be "invited," rather than compelled by "force and violence, to enter into the service of the type You XI "" "" "" ""

"country;" a plan which humanity must lament that policy has not even yet been able, or willing, to carry into execution. Prefixed to the original publication were an "Ode to the King, Pater Patrix," and an "Essay on Lyrick Poetry" It is but justice to confess, that he preserved neither of them; and that the ode itself, which in the first edition, and in the last, consists of seventy-three stanzas, in the author's own edition is reduced to forty-nine. Among the omitted passages is a "Wish," that concluded the poem, which few would have suspected Young of forming; and of which few, after having formed it, would confess something like their shame by suppression.

It stood originally so high in the author's opinion, that he intituled the poem, "Ocean, an Ode. Con"cluding with a Wish." This wish consists of thirteen stanzas. The first runs thus:

O may I steal
Along the vale
Of humble life, secure from foes!
My friend sincere,
My judgment clear,
And gentle business my repose!

The three last stanzas are not more remarkable for just rhymes: but, altogether, they will make rather a curious page in the life of Young:

Prophetic schemes,
And golden dreams,
May I, unsanguine, cast away!

Have what I have,

And hive, not lea e,

Fnamour d of the present day

My hours my own '

My faults unknown '

My chief revenue in content '

Then leave one beam

Of honest fame!

And score the lahour d manument!

Unhurt my urn
Till that great TURN
When mighty Nature's self shall die,
Time cease to glide,
With human pride,
Sank in the ocean of eternity!

It is whimsical that he, who was soon to bid adient to thyme, should fix upon a measure in which thyme abounds even to satisfy. Of this he said, in his? I say on Lyrick Poetry, prefixed to the poem—"For the more harmony likewise I chose the fre-" quent return of rhyme, which laid me under great "difficulties. But difficulties overcome, give grace and pleasure. Nor can I account for the pleasure "of rhyme in general (of which the moderns are too "fond) but from this truth. Yet the moderns surely deserve not much censure for their fondness of what, by his own confession, affords pleasure, and abounds in harmony.

The next paragraph in his Essay did not occur to him when he talked of "that great turn in the stanza just quoted "But then the writer must take" care that the difficulty is overcome That is, he "must make thyme consist with as perfect sense and expression, as could be expected if he was perfectly free from that shackle."

Another part of this Essay will convict the following stanza of, what every reader will discover in it, "involuntary burlesque."

The northern blast,
The shatter'd mast,
The syrt, the whillpool, and the rock,
The breaking spout,
The stars gone out,
The boiling streight, the monster's shock

But would the English poets fill quite so many volumes, if all their productions were to be tried, like this, by an elaborate essay on each particular species of poetry of which they exhibit specimens?

If Young be not a lyrick poet, he is at least a critick in that soit of poetry, and, if his lyrick poetry can be proved bad, it was first proved so by his own criticism. This surely is candid.

Milbouine was styled by Pope "the fairest of cri"ticks," only because he exhibited his own version of Viigil to be compared with Diyden's which he condemned, and with which every reader had it not otherwise in his power to compare it. Young wassurely not the most unfair of poets for prefixing to a lyrick composition an Essay on Lyrick Poetry, so just and impartial as to condemn himself.

We shall soon come to a work, before which we find indeed no critical essay, but which disdains to shrink from the touchstone of the severest critick; and which certainly, as I remember to have heard

you say, if it contain some of the worst, contains also some of the best things in the language

Soon after the appearance of "Oeean, when he was almost fifty, Young entered into Orders In April 1728*, not long after he had put on the gown, he was appointed chaplain to George the Second

The tragedy of "The Brothers, which was already in rehearsal, he immediately withdrew from the stage. The managers resigned it with some reluctance to the delicacy of the new clergyman. The Epilogue to "The Brothers, the only appendages to any of his three plays which he added himself, is, I believe, the only one of the kind. He ealls it an historical Epilogue. Finding that "Guilt's dradful close his narrow scene denicd," he, in a manner, continues the tragedy in the Epilogue, and relates how Rome revenged the shade of Demetrius, and punished Perseus "for this night's deed."

Of Young's taking Orders something is told by the biographer of Pope, which places the easiness and simplicity of the poet in a singular light. When he determined on the Church, he did not address himself to Sherlock, to Atterbury, or to Hare, for the best instructions in Theology but to Pope, who, in a youthful frolick, advised the diligent peru al of Thomas Aquinas. With this treasure Young retined from interruption to an obscure place in the auburbs. His poetical guide to godliness hearing nothing of him during half a year, and apprehending he might have earned the jest too far, 'sought after him, and found him just in time to prevent what Ruffhead calls "an irretrievable derangement."

^{*} Davie in hi life of Garrick says 1,00 and that it was produced that there years after which corresponds with date in p 328 C

That attachment to his favourite study, which made him think a poet the surest guide to his new profession, left him little doubt whether poetry was the surest path to its honours and pieferments. Not long indeed after he took Oiders, he published in prose, 1728, "A true Estimate of Human Life," dedicated, notwithstanding the Latin quotations with which it abounds, to the Queen, and a sermon preached before the House of Commons, 1729, on the martyrdom of King Charles, intituled, "An Apology " for Princes, or the Reverence due to Government." But the "Second Course," the counterpart of his "Estimate," without which it cannot be called "A "true Estimate," though in 1728 it was announced as "soon to be published," never appeared; and his old friends the Muses were not forgotten. - In 1730 he relapsed to poetry, and sent into the world "Im-"perium Pelagi a Naval Lyrick, written in imita-"tion of Pindai's Spirit, occasioned by his Majesty's "Return from Hanover, September 1729, and the "succeeding Peace" It is inscribed to the Duke of Chandos. In the Pieface we are told, that the Ode is the most spirited kind of Poetry, and that the Pindarick is the most spirited kind of Ode "This I "speak," he adds, "with sufficient candoui, at my "own very great peril But truth has an eternal title " to our confession, though we are sure to suffer by "it" Behold, again, the fanest of poets Young's "Imperium Pelagi" was ridiculed in Fielding's "Tom "Thumb," but, let us not forget that it was one of his pieces which the author of the "Night Thoughts" deliberately refused to own.

Not

Not long after this Pindarick attempt, he published two Epistles: to Pope, "concerning the Authors of "the Age, 1730 Of these poems one occasion seems to have been an apprehension lest, from the liveliness of his satires, he should not be deemed sufficiently serious for promotion in the Church

In July 1730 he was presented by his College to the rectory of Welwyn in Hertfordshire. In May 1731, he marned Lady Elizabeth Lee, drughter of the Earl of Lichfield, and widow of Colonel Lee His connexion with this lady arose from his fathers acquaintance, already mentioned, with Lady Anne Whirton, who was coheries of Sir Henry Lee of Ditchley in Oxfordshire. Poetry had lately been taught by Addison to aspire to the arms of nobility, though not with extraordinary happiness.

We may naturally conclude that Young now gave himself up in some measure to the comforts of his new connexion, and to the expectations of that preferment which he thought due to his poetical talents, or, at least, to the manner in which they had so frequently been exerted

The next production of his Muse was "The Sea-

Young enjoys the credit of whit is called an "Ex"tempore Epigram on Volture who, when he was in England, ridiculed, in the company of the jealous English poet, Milton's allegory of "Sin and "Death

You are so witty, profligate, and thin, At once we think thee Milton, Death, and Sin

 Γ_{rom}

From the following passage in the poetical Dedication of his "Sea-piece" to Voltaire, it seems that this extemporaneous reproof, if it must be extemporaneous (for what few will now affirm Voltaire to have deserved any reproof), was something longer than a distich, and something more gentle than the distich just quoted.

No stranger, Su, though born in foreign climes
On Dorset downs, when Milton's page,
With Sin and Death provok'd thy rage,
Thy rage provok'd, who sooth'd with gentle rhymes?

By "Dorset downs' he probably meant Mr. Dodington's seat In Pitt's Poems is "An Epistle to "Dr Edward Young, at Eastbury in Dorsetshire, "on the Review at Sarum, 1722."

While with your Dodington lettr'd you sit, Charm'd with his flowing Burgundy and wit, &c

Thomson, in his Autumn, addressing Mr. Dodington, calls his seat the seat of the Muses,

Where, in the secret bower and winding walk, For virtuous Young and thee they twine the bay.

The praises Thomson bestows but a few lines before on Philips, the second

Who nobly duist, in ihyme-unfetter'd veise, With British freedom sing the British song, added to Thomson's example and success, might perhaps induce Young, as we shall see presently, to write his great work without rhyme.

In 1734 he published "The Toreign Address, or "the best Argument for Perce, occasioned by the "British Fleet and the Posture of Affilis Written "in the Character of a Sailor It is not to be found in the author's four volumes"

He now appears to have given up all hopes of overtaking Pindar, and perhaps at last resolved to turn his, ambition to some original species of poetry. This poem concludes with a formal farewell to Ode, which ten of Young's readers will regret

My shell, which Cho gave, which Kings applaud, Which Europe's bleeding Genius call d abroad, Adieu'

In'n species of poetry altogether his own, he next tried his skill, and sneeceded

Of his wife he was deprived in 1741 Lady Thzabeth had lost, after her marriage with Young, an amiable daughter, by her former husband, just after she was married to Mr Temple, son of Lord Palmerston Mr Temple did not long remain after his wife, though he was married a second time, to a daughter of Sii John Burnaids, whose son is the present peer Mr and Mrs Temple have generally been considered as Philander and Narcissa From the great friendship which constantly subsisted between Mr I emple and Young, as well as from other eircumstances, it is probable that the poet had both him and Mrs Temple in view for these characters though at the same time some passages respecting Philander do not ap pear to suit either Mi Temple or any other person with whom Young was known to be connected or acquainted, while all the circumstances relating to Narcissa have been constantly found applicable to Young's daughter-in-law.

At what short intervals the poet tells us he was wounded by the deaths of the three persons particularly lamented, none that has read the "Night "Thoughts" (and who has not read them?) needs to be informed.

Insatiate Archei! could not one suffice?
Thy shaft flew thrice, and thrice my peace was slain,
And thrice, ere thrice you moon had fill'd her hoin

Yet how is it possible that Mr and Mis. Temple and Lady Elizabeth Young could be these three victims, over whom Young has hitherto been pitied for having to pour the "Midnight Soriows" of his religious poetry, Mrs Temple died in 1736; Mr. Temple four years afterwards in 1740, and the poet's wife seven months after Mr Temple, in 1741. How could the insatiate archer thrice slay his peace, in these three persons, "ere thrice the moon had fill'd "her horn?"

But in the short Preface to "The Complaint" he seriously tells us, "that the occasion of this poem "was real, not fictitious, and that the facts men"tioned did naturally pour these moral reflections on the thought of the writer." It is probable, therefore, that in these three contradictory lines, the poet complains more than the father-in-law, the friend, or the widower

Whatever names belong to these facts, or, if the names be those generally supposed, whatever heightening a poet's sorrow may have given the facts, to the sorrow Young felt from them, religion and morality nality are indebted for the "Night Thoughts There is a pleasure sure in sudness which mourners only know!"

Of these poems the two or three first have been perused perhaps more eagerly and more frequently than the rest. When he got as far as the fourth or fifth, his original motive for taking up the pen was answered. In grief was inturally either diminished or exhausted. We still find the same pious poet but we hear less of Philander and Nareissa, and less of the mourner whom he loved to pity.

Mrs Temple died of a consumption at Lyons, in her way to Nice, they ear after her marriage that is, when poetry relates the fact, "in her bridal hour It is more than poetically true, that Young accompanied her to the Continent

I flew, I suntch d her from the rigid North, And hore her nearer to the sun

But in vain. Her funeral was attended with the difficulties painted in such animated colours in "Night "the Third". After her death, the remainder of the party passed the ensuing winter at Nicc

The poet ceems perhaps in these compositions to dwell with more melaneholy on the death of Philan der and Narcissa, than of his wife. But it is only for this reason. He who runs and reads may remember, that in the "Night Thoughts" Philander and Narcissa are often mentioned and often lancited to recollect lainentations over the authors wife, the memory must have been charged with distinct passages. This hady brought hum one child, I rederich.

rick, now living, to whom the Prince of Wales was godfather.

That domestick grief is, in the first instance, to be thanked for these ornaments to our language, it is impossible to deny Noi would it be common hardiness to contend, that worldly discontent had no hand in these joint productions of poetry and piety. Yet am I by no means sure that, at any rate, we should not have had something of the same colour from Young's pencil, notwithstanding the liveliness of his satures. In so long a life, causes for discontent and occasions for grief must have occurred. It is not clear to me that his Muse was not sitting upon the watch for the first which happened "Night "Thoughts" were not uncommon to her, even when first she visited the poet, and at a time when he himself was remarkable neither for gravity nor gloomi-In his "Last Day," almost his earliest poem, he calls her "The Melancholy Maid,"

- whom dismal scenes delight, Frequent at tombs and in the realms of Night

In the prayer which concludes the second book of the same poem, he says

Oh! permit the gloom of solemn night To sacred thought may forcibly invite. Oh! how divine to tread the milky way, To the bright palace of Eternal Day!

When Young was writing a tragedy, Grafton is said by Spence to have sent him a human skull, with a candle in it, as a lamp. and the poet is reported to have used it.

What he calls "The true Estimate of Human "Life, which has already been mentioned, exhibits only the wrong side of the tapestry, and, being asked why he did not shew the right, he is said to have replied, that he could not By others it has been told me that this was finished, but that, before there existed any copy, it was torn in pieces by a lady's monkey

Still, is it altogether fair to dress up the poet for the man, and to bring the gloominess of the "Night "Thoughts to prove the gloominess of Young, and to shew that, his genus, like the genius of Swift, was in some mersure the sullentinspiration of discontent."

Whether you think with me, I know not but the famous "De mortus all his bonum always appeared to me to savour more of female weakness, than of manly reason. He that has too much feeling to speak ill of the dead, who, if they earnot defend themselves, are at least ignorant of his abuse, will not hesitate by the most wanton calumny to destroy the quiet, the reputation, the fortune, of the hving. Yet censure is not heard beneath the tomb, any more than praise. "De mortus all his verum "—De vivis all his bonum —would approach mucht nearer to good sense. After all, the few handfuls of remaining dust which once composed the body of the author of the "Night Thoughts" feel not much concern whether Young pass now for a man of sortow, or for a "fellow of infinite jest." To this favour must come the whole family of Youck His immortal part, wherever that now dwells, is still less solicitous on this head.

But to a son of worth and sensibility it is of some little consequence whether contemporaries believe, and posterity be taught to believe, that his debauched and reprobate life cast a Stygian gloom over the evening of his father's days, saved him the trouble of feigning a character completely detestable, and succeeded at last in bringing his "grey hairs with "sorrow to the grave"!

The humanity of the world, little satisfied with inventing perhaps a melancholy disposition for the father; proceeds next to invent an argument in support of their invention, and chooses that Lorenzo should be Young's own son The Biographia and every account of Young pretty roundly assert this to be the fact, of the absolute impossibility of which, the Biographia itself, in particular dates, contains undeniable evidence. Readers I know there are of a strange turn of mind, who will hereafter peruse the "Night Thoughts' with less satisfaction, who will wish they had still been deceived, who will quarrel with me for discovering that no such character as then Lorenzo ever yet disgraced human nature, or broke a father's heart Yet would these admirers of the sublime and terrible be offended, should you set them down for civel and for savage.

Of this report, inhuman to the surviving son, if it be true, in proportion as the character of Lorenzo is dribolical, where are we to find the proof? Perhaps it is clear from the poems

From the first line to the last of the "Night" Thoughts, no one expression can be discovered which betrays any thing like the father. In the "Second Night I find an expression which betrays something else that Lorenzo was his friend, one, it is possible, of his former companions one of the Duke of Wharton's set. The Poet styles him "gay friend" an appellation not very natural from pious incensed father to such a being as he paints Lorenzo, and that being his son

But let us see how he has sketched this dreadful portruit, from the sight of some of whose features the artist himself must have turned away with horror. A subject more shocking, if his only child really sat to him, than the crucifixion of Michael Angelo upon the horrid story told of which, Young composed a short Poem of fourteen lines in the early part of his life, which he did not think deserved to be republished.

In the "First Night, the address to the Poets supposed son is,

Lorenzo, Fortune makes her court to thee

In the "Fifth Night -

And burns Lorenzo still for the sublime Of life? to hang his airy nest on high?

Is this a picture of the son of the rector of Welwyn?

"Eighth " Eighth Night"

In foreign realms (for thou hast travell'd far) which even now does not apply to his son.

In "Night Five"

So wept Lorenzo fan Clarissa's fate, Who gave that angel-boy on whom he dotes, And died to give him, orphan'd in his birth!

At the beginning of the "Fifth Night" we find

Lorenzo, to recriminate is just, I grant the man is vain who writes for praise

But, to cut short all enquiry; if any one of these passages, if any passage in the poems, be applicable, my friend shall pass for Lorenzo. The son of the author of the " Night Thoughts" was not old enough, when they were written, to recriminate, or to be a father. The "Night Thoughts" were begun immediately after the mournful event of 1741. The first, "Nights" appear, in the books of the company of Stationers, as the property of Robert Dodsley, in 1742 The preface to "Night Seven" is dated July the 7th, 1744 The marriage, in consequence of which the supposed Lorenzo was born, happened in May 1731 Young's child was not boin till June 1733 In 1741 this Loienzo, this finished infidel, this father to whose education Vice had for some years put the last hand, was only eight years old

An anecdote of this civel sort, so open to contradiction, so impossible to be true, who could propagate? Thus easily are blasted the reputations of the living and of the dead.

Who, then, was Lorenzo' exclaim the readers I have mentioned If we cannot be sure that he was his son, which would have been finely terrible, was he not his nephew, his cousin?

These are questions which I do not pretend to answer For the sale of human nature, I could wish Lorenzo to have been only the creation of the Poets fancy like the Quintus of Anti Lucretius, "quo nomine,' says Polignae, "quemvis Atheum "intellige That this was the case, many expressions in the "Night Thoughts would seem to prove, did not a passage in "Night Eight appear to shew that he had something in his eye for the groundwork at least of the painting Lovelace or Lorenzo may be feigned characters but a writer does not feign a name of which he only gives the initial letter

Tell not Calista She will laugh thee dead, Or send thee to her hermitage with L

The Biographia not satisfied with pointing out the son of Young in that son's life time, as his tather's Lorenzo, travels out of its way into the history of the son, and tells of his having been forbidden his college at Oxford for misbehaviour How such anecdotes were they true, tend to illustrate the life of Young, it is not easy to discover Was the son of the author of the 'Night Thoughts, indeed, forbidden his eollege for a time, at one of the Universities ' The author of "Paradise Lost is by some supposed to have been disgracefully ejected from the other From juvenile follies who is free? But, whatever the Biographia chooses to relate, the son of Young experienced no dismission from his college Young experiences are either lasting or temporary

Yet,

Yet, were nature to indulge him with a second youth, and to leave him at the same time the experience of that which is past, he would probably spend it differently who would not? he would certainly be the occasion of less uneasiness to his father. But, from the same experience, he would as certainly, in the same case, be treated differently by his father.

Young was a poet poets, with reverence be it spoken, do not make the best parents. Fancy and imagination seldom deign to stoop from their heights, always stoop unwillingly to the low level of common duties. Aloof from vulgar life, they pursue their rapid flight beyond the ken of mortals, and descend not to earth but when compelled by necessity. The prose of ordinary occurrences is beneath the dignity of poets.

He who is connected with the author of the "Night Thoughts," only by venciation for the Poet and the Christian, may be allowed to observe, that Young is one of those, concerning whom, as you remark in your account of Addison, it is proper rather to say "nothing that is false than all that is "true"

But the son of Young would almost sooner, I know, pass for a Loienzo, than see himself vindicated, at the expence of his father's memory, from follies which, if it may be thought blameable in a boy to have committed them, it is surely praiseworthy in a man to lament, and certainly not only unnecessary but civel in a biographer to record

Of the "Night Thoughts," notwithstanding their author's professed retriement, all are inscribed to great or to growing names. He had not yet weaned himself from Larls and Dukes, from the Speakers of the House of Commons, Lords Commissioners of the Treasury, and Chancellors of the Exchequer In "Night Eight the politician plumly betrays himself

Think no post needful that demands a knave When late our enal helm was shifting hands, thought think better if you can So P

Yet it must be confessed, that at the conclusion of "Night Nine, weary perhaps of courting earthly patrons, he tells his soul,

Henceforth Thy patron he, whose dindem has dropt You genis of Heaven Fternity the prize, And leave the racers of the world their own

The," Fourth Night was addressed by "a much-" andebted Muse to the Honourable Mr Yorl e, now Lord Hardwicke who meant to have laid the Muse under still greater obligation, by the living of Shenfield in Essex, if it had become vicinit

, The "I irst Night concludes with this presige-Dark, though not blind, like thee, Meonides 1 (1 Or Milton, thee Ah! could I reach your strain, Or his who made Meonides our own !

Man too he sung Inimortal man I sing

11 Oh had he prest his theme, pursu d the track Which opens out of durkness into day I Oh had he mounted on his wing of fire, Soar d, where I sinl, and sun, immortal man-How had it blest mankind, and rescu dime!

To the author of these lines was dedicated, in 1756, the first volume of an "Essay on the Writings " and 1 2

" and Genius of Pope," which attempted, whether justly or not, to pluck from Pope his "Wing of "Fire," and to reduce him to a rank at least one degree lower than the first class of English poets. If Young accepted and approved the dedication, he countenanced this attack upon the fame of him whom he invokes as his Muse.

Part of "paper-sparing" Pope's Third Book of the "Odyssey," deposited in the Museum, is written upon the back of a letter signed "E. Young," which is clearly the hand-writing of our Young. The Letter, dated only May the 2d, seems obscure, but there can be little doubt that the friendship he requests was a literary one, and that he had the highest literary opinion of Pope. The request was a prologue, I am told
"Dear Sir,

May the 2d.

"Having been often from home, I know not if "you have done me the favour of calling on me. "But, be that as it will; I much want that instance " of your friendship I mentioned in my last, a friend-"ship I am very sensible I can receive from no one "but yoursel? I should not urge this thing so much "but for very particular reasons, nor can you be at "a loss to conceive how a 'trifle of this nature' may " be of a serious moment to me; and while I am in " hopes of the great advantage of your advice about " it, I shall not be so absurd as to make any further "step without it I know you are much engaged, "and only hope to hear of you at your entire leisure.

"I am, Sir, your most faithful " and obedient servant,

" E. Young."

Nay,

Nay, even after Pope's death, he says, in "Night " Seven.

Pope, who could'st make immortals, art thou dead?

Lither the "Essay, then, was dedicated to a patron who disapproved its doctrine, which I have been told by the author was not the case or Young appears, in his old age, to have bartered for a dedication an opinion entertained of his friend through all that part of life when he must have been best able to form opinions

From this account of Young, two or three short passages, which stand almost together in "Night "Four, should not be excluded They afford a picture by his own hand, from the study of which my readers may choose to form their own opinion of the features of his mind and the complexion of his life

Ah me! the dire effect Of lostering here, of death defrauded long, Of old so gracious (and let that suffice) My very master knows me not I ve been so long remember d, I m forgot

When in his courtiers ears I pour my plaint, They drink it as the Nectar of the Great, And squeeze my hand, and beg me come to morrow

Twice told the period spent on stubborn Troy, Court favour, yet untaken, I besiege

If this song lives, Posterity shall know One, though in Britain born, with courtiers bred, Who Who thought ev'n gold might come a day too late, Noi on his subtle death-bed plann'd his scheme For future vacancies in church or state

Deduct from the writer's age "twice told the period "spent on stubboin Troy," and you will still leave him more than forty when he sat down to the miserable siege of court-favour. He has before told us

"A fool at forty is a fool indeed"

After all, the siege seems to have been raised only in consequence of what the General thought his "death-" bed."

By these extraordinary Poems, written after he was sixty, of which I have been led to say so much, I hope, by the wish of doing justice to the living and the dead, it was the desire of Young to be principally known He entitled the four volumes which he published himself, "The works of the Author of "the Night Thoughts" While it is remembered that from these he excluded many of his writings, let it not be forgotten that the rejected pieces contained nothing prejudicial to the cause of virtue, or of religion. Were every thing that Young ever wrote to be published, he would only appear perhaps in a less respectable light as a poet, and more despicable as a dedicator, he would not pass for a worse Christian, or for a worse man This enviable praise is due to Young Can it be claimed by every writer? His dedications, after all, he had perhaps no right to suppress They all, I believe, speak, not a little to the credit of his gratitude, of favours received, and I know not whether the author, who has . has once solemnly printed an acknowledgement of a favour, should not always print it

Is it to the credit or to the discredit of Young, as a poet, that of his "Night Thoughts the French are particularly fond"

Of the "Epitaph on Lord Aubrey Beauclerk, dated 1740, all I I now is, that I find it in the late body of English Poetry, and that I am sorry to find it there

Notwithstanding the farewel which he seemed to have taken in the "Night Thoughts of every thing which bore the least resemblance to ambition, he dipped again in politicks—In 1745 he wrote "Re" flections on the publick Situation of the Kingdom, "addressed to the Duke of Newcastle—indignant, as it appears, to behold

— n pope bred Princeling crawl ashore,
And whistle cut throats, with those swords that scrap d
Their barren rocks for wretched sustemance,
To cut his passage to the British throne

This political poem might be called a "Night "Thought" Indeed it was originally printed as the conclusion of the "Night Thoughts, though he did not gather it with his other works

Prefixed to the second edition of Howes "Devout" Meditations is a letter from Young dated January 19, 1752, addressed to Archibald Macauly, Esq. thanking him for the book, which he says "he shall never lay far out of his reach for a greater demonstration of a sound head and a sincere heart "he never say."

In 1753, when "The Brothers" had lain by him above thirty years, it appeared upon the stage. If any part of his fortune had been acquired by servility of adulation, he now determined to deduct from it no inconsiderable sum, as a gift to the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel. To this sum he hoped the profits of "The Brothers" would amount. In his calculation he was deceived, but by the bad success of his play the Society was not a loser. The author made up the sum he originally intended, which was a thousand pounds, from his own pocket The next performance which he printed was a prose publication, entituled, "The Centaur not fabulous, "in six Letters to a Friend on the Life in Vogue." The conclusion is dated November 29, 1754. In the third Letter is described the death-bed of the "gay, young, noble, ingenious, accomplished, and "most wretched Altamont." His last words were "my principles have poisoned my friend, my ex-"travagance has beggared my boy, my unkindness "has murdered my wife!" Either Altamont and Lorenzo were the twin production of fancy, or Young was unlucky enough to know two characters who bore no little resemblance to each other in perfection of wickedness. Report has been accustomed to call Altamont Lord Euston.

"The Old Man's Relapse," occasioned by an Epistle to Walpole, if written by Young, which I much doubt, must have been written very late in life. It has been seen, I am told, in a Miscellany published thirty years before his death. In 1758, he exhibited "The Old Man's Relapse" in more than words.

words, by again becoming a dedicator, and publishing a sermon addressed to the King

The lively Letter in Prose, on "Original Com"position, addressed to Richardson, the author of "Clarissa, appeared in 1759 Though he despair
"of breaking through the frozen obstructions of "age and care's incumbent cloud, into that flow of "thought and brightness of expression which sub"jects so polite require, yet is it more like the production of untamed, unbridled youth, than of jaded fourscore Some sevenfold volumes put him in mind of Ovid's sevenfold channels of the Nile at the configeration

ostia septem Pulverulenti vocant, septem sine flumine valles

Such leaden labours are like Lycurgus's fron money, which was so much less in value than in bulk, that it required barns for strong boxes, and a yoke of oxen to draw five hundred pounds.

If there is a famine of invention in the land, we must travel, he says, hile Joseph's brethren, far for food we must visit the remote and rich ancients. But an inventive genius may safely stay at home, that, like the widow's cruse, is divinely replenished from within, and affords us a miraculous delight. He asks why it should seem altogether impossible, that Heaven's latest editions of the human mind may be the most correct and fur? And Johnson, he tells us, was very learned, as Sampson was very strong, to his own hurt. Blind to the nature of tragedy, he pulled down all antiquity on his head, and buried himself under it.

Is this "care's incumbent cloud," or "the frozen "obstructions of age?"

In this letter Pope is severely censured for his "fall from Homer's numbers, free as air, lofty and "harmonious as the spheres, into children shackles "and tinkling sounds; for putting Achilles into "petticoats a second time." but we are told that the dying swan talked over an Epic plan with Young a few weeks before his decease

Young's chief inducement to write this letter was, as he confesses, that he might erect a monumental marble to the memory of an old friend. He, who employed his pious pen for almost the last time in thus doing justice to the exemplary death-bed of Addison, might probably, at the close of his own life, afford no unuseful lesson for the deaths of others.

In the postscript, he writes to Richardson, that he will see in his next how far Addison is an original. But no other letter appears

The few lines which stand in the last edition, as "sent by Lord Melcombe to Dr Young, not long before his Lordship's death," were indeed so sent, but were only an introduction to what was there meant by "The Muse's latest Spark." The poem is necessary, whatever may be its ment, since the Preface to it is already printed. Lord Melcombe called his Tusculum "La Trappe."

"Love thy country, wish it well,
Not with too intense a care,
"Tis enough that, when it fell,
Thou its ruin didst not share

Envy s censure, Plattery s praise,
With unmoved indifference view,
Learn to tread life s dangerous maze,
With unerring Virtue's clue

Void of strong desire and fear, Life's wide ocean trust no more, Strive thy little bark to steer With the tide, but near the shore

Thus prepar d, thy shorten d sail
Shall, whene er the winds increase,
Seizing each propitious gale,
Waft thee to the Port of Peace

Leep thy conscience from offence,
And tempestuous passions free
So, when thou art call d from hence,
Lusy shall thy passage be,

Lasy shall thy passage be,
Cheerful thy allotted stay,
Short th account twick God and thee
Hope shall meet thee on the way

Truth shall lead thee to the gate, Mercy s self shall let thee in Where its never changing state Full perfection shall begin

The Pocm was accompanied by a Letter

" La Trappe, the 27th of Oct 1761

" Dear Sir,

"You seemed to like the ode I sent you for your amusement I now send it you as a present If you please to accept of it, and me willing that our friendship should be known when we are gone, been merited?

"you will be pleased to leave this among those of your own papers that may possibly see the light by a posthumous publication. God send us health while we stay, and an easy journey!

"My dear Dr. Young,

"Yours, most cordially,

" MELCOMBE."

In 1762, a short time before his death, Young published "Resignation." Notwithstanding the manner in which it was really forced from him by the world, criticism has treated it with no common severity. If it shall be thought not to deserve the highest piaise, on the other side of fourscore, by whom, except by Newton and by Waller, has praise

To Mrs. Montagu, the famous champion of Shakspeare, I am indebted for the history of "Re-"signation" Observing that Mrs. Boscawen, in the midst of her grief for the loss of the admiral, derived consolation from the perusal of the "Night" Thoughts," Mrs Montagu proposed a visit to the author. From conversing with Young, Mrs Boscawen derived still further consolation, and to that visit she and the world were indebted for this poem It compliments Mrs. Montagu in the following lines:

Yet write I must A Lady sues
How shameful her request!
My brain in labour with dull rhyme,
Hers teeming with the best!

And again

1

And friend you have, and I the same, Whose prudent, soft address Will bring to life those healing thoughts Which died in your distress

That friend, the spirit of thy theme
Extracting for your ease,
Will leave to me the dreg, in thoughts
Too common, such as these

By the same Lady I was embled to say, in her own words, that Young's unbounded genius appeared to greater advantage in the companion than even in the author that the Christian was in him a character still more inspired, more enraptured, more sublime, than the poet and that, in his ordinary conversation, letting down the golden chain from high, He draw his audience upward to the sky ' ;

Notwithstanding Young had said, in his "Con"jectures ion original Composition, that "blank
"verse is verse unfallen, uncurst, verse reclaimed,
"re-inthroned in the true language of the Gods' notwithstanding he administered consolation to his own grief in this immortal language, Mrs Boscawen was comforted in rhyme

While the poet and the Christian were applying this comfort, Young had himself occasion for comfort, in consequence of the sudden death of Richardson, who was printing the former part of the poem Of Richardson's death he say.

When

When Heaven would kindly set us free,
And earth's enchantment end,
It takes the most effectual means,
And robs us of a friend

To "Resignation" was prefixed an Apology for its appearance—to which more credit is due than to the generality of such apologies, from Young's unusual anxiety that no more productions of his old age should disgrace his former fame. In his will, dated February 1760, he desires of his executors, in a particular manner, that all his manuscript books and writings whatever might be burned, except his book of accounts

In September 1764, he added a kind of codicil, wherein he made it his dying intreaty to his house-keeper, to whom he left 1000l "that all his ma-"nuscripts might be destroyed as soon as he was "dead, which would greatly oblige her deceased "friend."

It may teach mankind the uncertainty of worldly friendships, to know that Young, either by surviving those he loved, or by outliving their affections, could only recollect the names of two friends, his housekeeper and a hatter, to mention in his will; and it may serve to repress that testamentary pride, which too often seeks for sounding names and titles, to be informed that the author of the "Night" Thoughts" did not blush to leave a legacy to his "friend Henry Stevens, a hatter at the Temple-gate" Of these two remaining friends, one went before Young But, at eighty-four, "where," as he asks in The Centain, " is that world into which we were "born?

The same humility which marked a latter and a housekeeper for the friends of the author of the "Night Thoughts," had before bestowed the same title on his footman, in an epitaph in his "Churchit" and upon James Baker, dated 1749 which I am glad to find in the late collection of his works

Young and his housekeeper were ridicaled with more ill nature than wit, in a kind of novel published by Kidgell in 1775, called," The Card, ander the names of Dr Elwes and Mrs Fusby

In April 176,, at an age to which few attain, a period was put to the life of X oung

He had performed no duty for three or four years, but he retained his intellects to the last

Much is told in the "Biographia, which I know not to have been true, of the manner of his burnal of the master and children of a charity school, which he founded in his parish, who neglected to attend their benefactors corpse and of a bell, which was not caused to toll as often as upon those occasions bells usually toll Had that humanity, which is here lavished upon things of little consequence either to the living or to the dead, been shown in its proper place to the living, I should have had less to say about Lorenzo They who lament that these insfortunes happened to Young, forget the praise he bestows upon Socrates, in the Preface to "Night "Seven, for resenting his friend's request about his funeral"

During some part of his life. Young was abroad, but I have not been able to learn any particulars

In his seventh Satire he says,

When, after battle, I the field have STLN Spread o'er with ghastly shapes which once were men

It is known also, that from this or from some other field he once wandered into the camp with a classick in his hand, which he was reading intently; and had some difficulty to prove that he was only an absent poet, and not a spy

The curious reader of Young's life will naturally inquire to what it was owing, that though he lived almost forty years after he took Orders, which included one whole reign uncommonly long, and part of another, he was never thought worthy of the least preferment. The author of the "Night Thoughts" ended his days upon a Living which came to him from his College without any favour, and to which he probably had an eye when he determined on the Church To satisfy curiosity of this kind is, at this distance of time, fai from easy. The parties themselves know not often, at the instant, why they are neglected, or why they are preferred. The neglect of Young is by some ascribed to his having attached himself to the Prince of Wales, and to his having preached an offensive sermon at St. James's. been told me that he had two hundred a year in the late reign, by the pationage of Walpole, and that, whenever any one reminded the King of Young, the only answer was, "he has a pension." All the light thrown on this inquity, by the following Letter from Secker, only serves to shew at what a late period of life the author of the "Night Thoughts" solicited preferment:

" Deanery

"Dennery of St Paul's, July 8, 1758

" Good Dr Young,

" I have long wondered, that more suitable no "tice of your great merit hath not been taken by " persons in power But how to remedy the omission "I see not No encouragement hath ever been given " me to mention things of this nature to his Majesty " And therefore, in all likelihood, the only conse-" quence of doing it would be werkening the little "influence which else I may possibly have on some "other occasions Your fortune and your reputation " set you above the need of advancement, and your " sentiments, above that concern for it, on your own "account, which, on that of the Public, is sincerely " felt by

" Your loving Brother,

"THO CANT

At last, at the age of four-core, he was appointed, in 1761, Clerk of the Closet to the Princess Downger

One obstacle must line stood not a little in the way of that preferment after which his whole life seems to live panted Though he took Orders, he never entirely shook off Politicks He was always the Lion of his master Milton, "prwing to get free his hin-" der parts By this conduct, if he guined some friends, lie made many enemies

Again Young was a poet and again, with reverence be it spoken, poets by profession do not always make the best clergy men If the author of the "Night Thoughts composed many sermons he did not oblige the publick with many
Vol. XI Z

Besides,

Besides, in the latter part of life, Young was fond of holding himself out for a man retired from the world. But he seemed to have forgotten that the same verse which contains "oblitus meorum," contains also "obliviscendus et illis." The brittle chain of worldly friendship and patronage is broken as effectually, when one goes beyond the length of it, as when the other does. To the vessel which is sailing from the shore, it only appears that the shore also recedes; in life it is truly thus. He who retires from the world will find himself, in reality, deserted as fast, if not faster, by the world. The publick is not to be treated as the coxcomb treats his mistress; to be threatened with desertion, in order to increase fondness.

Young seems to have been taken at his word. Not-withstanding his frequent complaints of being neglected, no hand was reached out to pull him from that retirement of which he declared himself enamoured. Alexander assigned no palace for the residence of Diogenes, who boasted his surly satisfaction with his tub.

Of the domestick manners and petty habits of the author of the "Night Thoughts," I hoped to have given you an account from the best authority: but who shall dare to say, To-norrow I will be wise or virtuous, or to-morrow I will do a particular thing? Upon enquiring for his house-keeper, I learned that she was builed two days before I reached the town of her abode.

The Letter from Tscharmer, a noble foreigner, to Count Haller, Tscharner gays, he has lately spent four days with Young at Welmyn, where the author tastes all the ease and pleasure mankind can desire "Every thing about him shows the man, each indi"vidual being placed by rule All is neat without

"art He is very pleasant in conversation, and ex"tremely polite

This, and more, may possibly be true, but Tscharners was a first visit, a visit of curiosity and admiration, and a visit which the author expected

Of Edward Young an anecdote which wanders among readers is not true, that he was Pickling's Parson Adams The original of that famous punting was William Young, who was a clergyman He supported an uncomfortable existence by translating for the booksellers from Greek and, if he did not seem to be his own friend, was at least no man's enemy. Yet the facility with which this report has gained belief in the world argues, were it not sufficiently hown, that the author of the "Night Thoughts bore some resemblance to Adams"

The attention which Young bestowed upon the perusal of books is not unworthy imitation. When any passage pleased him, he appears to have folded down the leaf. On these passages he bestowed a second reading quently vain. Before he returned to much of what he had once approved, he died. Many of his books, which I have seen, are by those notes of approbation so swelled beyond their real bulk, that they will hardly shut.

What though we wade in wealth, or soar in fame the Earth's highest station ends in *Here he lies!*And dust to dust concludes her noblest song!

The author of these lines is not without his Hic jacet.

By the good sense of his son, it contains none of that plaise which no marble can make the bad or the foolish merit, which, without the direction of a stone of a turf, will find its way, sooner or later, to the deserving.

M S
Optimi Parentis
EDVARDI YOUNG, LL D.
hujus Ecclesiae rect Et Elizabethæ
fæm prænob
Conjugis ejus amantissimæ, pio & gratissimo animo
hoc marmor posuit
F Y
Filius superstes

Is it not strange that the author of the "Night" Thoughts" has inscribed no monument to the memory of his lamented wife? Yet, what maible will endure as long as the poems?

Such, my good friend, is the account which I have been able to collect of the great Young. That it may be long before any thing like what I have just transcribed be necessary for you, is the sincere wish of,

Dear Sir,
Your greatly obliged Friend,
HERBERT CROFT, Jun.

Lincoln's Inn, Sept 1780. P S This account of Young was seen by you in manuscript, you know, Sir, and, though I could not prevail on you to make any alteration, you insisted on striking out one passage, because it said, that, if I did not wish you to live long for your sake, I did for the sake of my selfand of the world But this post-script you will not see before the printing of it, and I will say here, in spite of you, how I feel myself honoured and bettered by your friendship and that, if I do credit to the Church, after v high I always longed, and for which I am now going to give in exchange the Bar, though not at so late a period of life as Young took Orders, it will be owing, in no small measure, to my having had the happiness of calling the author of "The Rambler' my friend

H C

Oxford Oct 1,82 OF Young's Poems it is difficult to give any general character; for he has no uniformity of manner: one of his pieces has no great resemblance to another. He began to write early, and continued long; and at different times had different modes of poetical excellence in view. His numbers are sometimes smooth, and sometimes rugged; his style is sometimes concatenated, and sometimes abrupt, sometimes diffusive, and sometimes concise. His plan seems to have started in his mind at the present moment; and his thoughts appear the effect of chance, sometimes adverse, and sometimes lucky, with very little operation of judgment.

He was not one of those writers whom experience improves, and who, observing their own faults, become gradually correct. His Poem on the "Last "Day," his first great performance, has an equability and propriety, which he afterwards either never endeavoured or never attained. Many paragraphs are noble, and few are mean, yet the whole is languid; the plan is too much extended, and a succession of images divides and weakens the general conception, but the great reason why the reader is disappointed is, that the thought of the Last Day makes every man more than poetical, by spreading over his mind a general obscurity of sacred horror, that oppresses distinction, and disdains expression

His story of "Jane Grey," was never popular. It is written with elegance enough; but Jane is too heroick to be pitied.

The "Universal Passion' is indeed a very great performance. It is said to be a series of Epigrams but, if it be, it is what the author intended. his endeavour was at the production of striking distichs and pointed sentences, and his distichs have the weight of solid sentiment, and his points the sharpness of resistless truth.

His characters are often selected with discernment, and drawn with nicety, his illustrations are often happy, and his reflections often just. His species of satire is between those of Horace and Juscinal and he has the gaiety of Horace without his lastity of numbers, and the morality of Juvenal with greater variation of images. He plays, indeed, only on the surface of life he never penetrates the recesses of the mind, and therefore the whole power of his poetry is exhausted by a single perusal, his conceits please only when they surprise.

To translate he never condescended, unless his

To translate he never condescended, unless his "Paraphrase on Job may be considered as a version in which he has not, I think, been unsuccessful he indeed favoured himself, by chusing those parts which most easily admit the ornaments of English poetry

He had least success in his lyrick attempts, in which he seems to have been under some malignant influence he is always labouring to be great, and at last is only turgid

In his "Night Thoughts he has exhibited a very wide display of original poetry, variegated with deep reflections and striking allusions, a wilderness of thought, in which the fertility of fancy scatters flowers of every hic and of every odour. This is one of the few poems in which blank verse could not be changed for thyme but with disadvantage. The wild diffusion of the sentiments, and the digressive sallies of imagination, would have been compressed and restrained by confinement to thyme. The excellence of this work is not exactness, but copiousness; particular lines are not to be regarded, the power is in the whole, and in the whole there is a magnificence like that ascribed to Chinese plantation, the magnificence of vast extent and endless diversity.

His last poem was "Resignation," in which he made, as he was accustomed, an experiment of a new mode of writing, and succeeded better than in his "Ocean" or his "Merchant". It was very falsely represented as a proof of decayed faculties. There is Young in every stanza, such as he often was in the highest vigour.

His tragedies, not making part of the Collection, I had forgotten, till M1 Steevens recalled them to my thoughts by remarking, that he seemed to have one favourite catastrophe, as his three plays all concluded with lavish suicide; a method by which, as Dryden remarked, a poet easily rids his scene of persons whom he wants not to keep alive In "Busilis" there are the greatest ebullitions of imagination: but the pride of Busins is such as no other man can have, and the whole is too remote from known life to raise either guef, terror, or indignation. The "Revenge" approaches much nearer to human practices and manners, and therefore keeps possession of the stage first design seems suggested by "Othello," but the reflections, the incidents, and the diction, are original. The moral observations are so introduced, and so expressed, as to have all the novelty that can be required Of "The Brothers I may be allowed to say nothing, since nothing was ever said of it by the publick

Itmust be allowed of Young's poetry, that it abounds in thought, but without much accuracy or selection. When he lays hold of an illustration, he pursues it beyond expectation, sometimes happily, as in his parallel of Quicksilver with Pleasure, which I have heard repeated with approbation by a Lady, of whose praise he would have been justly proud, and which is very ingenious, very subtle, and almost exact but sometimes he is less lucky, as when, in his "Night" Thoughts, having it dropped into his mind, that the orbs, floating in space, might be called the cluster of creation, he thinks of a cluster of grapes, and says, that they all hang on the great vine, drinking the "nectareous junce of immortal life

His concerts are sometimes yet less valuable. In the "Last Diy he hopes to illustrate the re assembly of the taoms that compose the human body at the "Trump of Doom by the collection of bees into a swarm at the tinkling of a pan

The Prophet says of Tyre, that "her Merchants "are Princes Young says of Tyre, in his "Mcr-"chant,

Her merchant Princes, and each deck a Throne Let burlesque try to go beyond him

He has the trick of joining the turned and familiar to buy the alliance of Britain, "Climes were paid down Antithesis is his favourite, "They for Lindness hate and "because she's right, she's "ever in the wrong

His

His versification is his own, neither his blank nor his rhyming lines have any resemblance to those of former writers, he picks up no hemisticlis, he copies no favourite expressions; he seems to have laid up no stores of thought or diction, but to owe all to the fortuitous suggestions of the present moment. Yet I have reason to believe that, when once he had formed a new design, he then laboured it with very patient industry, and that he composed with great labour, and frequent revisions.

His verses are formed by no certain model; he is no more like himself in his different productions than he is like others. He seems never to have studied prosody, nor to have had any direction but from his own ear. But with all his defects, he was a man of genius and a poet.

MALLET

OF DAVID MALLET, hwing no written memorial, I am able to give no other account than such as is supplied by the unauthorised loquacity of common fame, and a very slight personal knowledge

He was by his original one of the Macgregors, a clan, that became, about sixty years ago, under the conduct of Robin Roy, so formidable and so infa mous for violence and robbery, that the name was an nulled by a legal abolition—and when they were all to denominate themselves anew, the father, I suppose, of this author, called himself Malloch

David Malloch was, by the penury of his parents, compelled to be Jamtor of the High School at Edinburgh a mean office, of which he did not afterwards delight to hear But he surmounted the dis advantages of his birth and fortune for, when the Duke of Montrose applied to the College of Edinburgh for a tutor to educate his sons, Malloch was

recom-

recommended; and I never heard that he dishonoured his credentials

When his pupils were sent to see the world, they were entrusted to his care; and, having conducted them round the common circle of modish travels, he returned with them to London, where, by the influence of the family in which he resided, he naturally gained admission to many persons of the highest rank, and the highest character, to wits, nobles, and statesmen.

Of his works, I know not whether I can trace the series. His first production was "William and Mar-" garet;" of which, though it contains nothing very striking or difficult, he has been envied the reputation, and plagrarism has been boldly charged, but never proved

Not long afterwards he published the "Excursion" (1728), a desultory and capricious view of such scenes of Nature as his fancy led him, or his knowledge enabled him, to describe. It is not devoid of poetical spirit. Many of his images are striking, and many of the paragraphs are elegant. The cast of diction seems to be copied from Thomson, whose "Seasons" were then in their full blossom of reputation. He has Thomson's beauties and his faults.

His poem on "Verbal Criticism" (1733) was written to pay court to Pope, on a subject which he cither did not understand, or willingly misrepresented; and is little more than an improvement, or rather expansion, of a fragment which Pope printed in a Miscellany long before he engrafted it into a regular poem. There is in this piece more pertness than wit, and more confidence than knowledge. The versification is tolerable, nor can criticism allow it a higher praise.

^{*} Mallet's "William and Margaret" was printed in Aaron Hill's "Plain Dealer," No 36, July 24, 1724 'In its original state it was very different from what it is in the last edition of his works. Dr J

His first tragedy was "Eurydice, acted at Drury Lane in 1731 of which I I now not the reception nor the merit, but have heard it mentioned as a mean performance. He was not then too high to accept a Prologue and Epilogue from Aaron Hill, neither of which can be much commended.

Having cleared his tongue from his native pronunciation so as to be no longer distinguished as a Scot, he seems inclined to disencumber himself from all adherences of his original, and took upon him to change his name from Scotch Malloch to English Mallet, without any imaginable reason of preference which the eye or ear can discover. What other proofs he gave of disrespect to his native country, I know not but it was remarked of him, that he was the only Scot whom Scotchmen did not commend.

About this time Pope, whom he visited familiarly, published his "Essay on Man, but concealed the author and, when Mallet entered one day, Pope isked him slightly, what there was new Mallet told lim, that the newest piece was something called an "Essay on Man, which he had inspected idly, and seeing the utter mability of the author, who had neither skill in writing nor knowledge of the subject, had had tossed it away. Pope, to punish his self-conceit, told him the secret.

A new edition of the works of Bacon being prepared (1750) for the press, Mallet was employed to prefix a Life, which he has written with elegance, perhaps with some affectation; but with so much more knowledge of historythan of science, that, when he afterwards undertook the Life of Marlborough, Warburton remarked, that he might perhaps forget that Marlborough was a general as he had forgotten that Bacon was a philosopher.

When the Prince of Wales was driven from the palace, and, setting liminself at the head of the opposition, kept a separate count, he endeavoured to encrease his popularity by the patronage of literature, and made Mallet his under-secretary, with a salary of two hundred pounds a year, Thomson likewise had a pension, and they were associated in the composition of "The Masque of Alfred," which in its original state was played at Chefden in 1740; it was afterwards almost wholly changed by Mallet, and brought upon the stage at Drury Lane in 1751, but with no great success

Mallet, in a familiar conversation with Garrick, discoursing of the diligence which he was then exerting upon the "Life of Mailborough," let him know, that in the series of great men quickly to be exhibited, he should find a nitch for the hero of the Theatre Garrick professed to wonder by what artifice he could be introduced: but Mallet let him know, that, by a dexterous anticipation, he should fix him in a conspicuous place. "Mr. Mallet," says Garrick, in his gratitude of exultation, "have you left off to write

"for the stage? Mallet then confessed that he had a drama in his hands Garrick promised to act it, and 'Alfred was produced

The long retardation of the life of the Duke of Marlborough shews, with strong conviction, how little confidence can be placed in posthumous renown When he died, it was soon determined that his story should be delivered to posterity, and the papers supposed to contain the necessary information were delivered to Lord Molesworth, who had been his favourite in Flanders When Molesworth died, the same papers were transferred with the same design to Sir Richard Steele, who in some of his exigences put them in pown They then remained with the old Duchess, who in her will assigned the task to Glover and Mallet, with a reward of a thousand pounds, and a prohibition to insert any verses Glover rejected, I suppose with disdain, the legacy, and devolved the whole work upon Mallet who had from the late Duke of Marlborough a pension to promote his industry, and who talked of the discoveries which he had made but left not, when he died, any historical labours behind him

While he was in the Prince's service he published "Mustapha, with a Prologue by Thomson, not mean, but far inferior to that which he had received from Mallet, for "Agamemnon The Epilogue, said to be written by a friend, was composed in haste by Mallet, in the place of one promised, which was never given This tragedy was dedicated to the Prince his master. It was acted at Druny-lane in 1739, and was well received, but was never revived.

In 1740, he produced, as has been already mentioned, "The Masque of Alfred," in conjunction with Thomson

For some time afterwards he lay at rest. After a long interval, his next work was "Amyntoi and "Theodora" (1747), a long story in blank verse; in which it cannot be denied that there is copiousness and elegance of language, vigoui of sentiment, and imagery well adapted to take possession of the fancy. But it is blank verse. This he sold to Vaillant for one hundred and twenty pounds. The flist sale was not great, and it is now lost in forgetfulness.

Mallet, by address or accident, perhaps by his dependance on the prince, found his way to Boling-broke; a man whose pride and petulance made his kindness difficult to gain, or keep, and whom Mallet was content to court by an act, which I hope, was unwillingly performed. When it was found that Pope had clandestinely printed an unauthorised pamphlet called "The Patriot King," Bolingbroke, in a fit of useless fury, resolved to blast his memory, and employed Mallet (1749) as the executioner of his vengeance Mallet had not virtue, or had not spirit, to refuse the office, and was rewarded, not long after, with the legacy of lord Bolingbroke's works

Many of the political pieces had been written during the opposition to Walpole, and given to Franklin, as he supposed, in perpetuity. These among the rest, were claimed by the will. The question was referred to arbitrators; but, when they decided against Mallet, he refused to yield to the award, and by the help of Millar the Bookseller, published all that he could

eould find, but with success very much below his expectation

In 1755, his masque of "Britannia was acted at Drury Lane and his tragedy of "Elvira" in 1763 in which year he was appointed keeper of the Book of Fatrics for ships in the port of London In the beginning of the last war, when the nation

In the beginning of the last war, when the nation was exasperated by ill success, he was employed to turn the publick vengenice upon Bang, and wrote a letter of necessation under the character of necessation under the paper was with great industry concentration, had necessationally provided upon him, which he retained to his death

Fowards the end of his life he went with his wife to France, but after a while, finding his health dechining, he returned alone to Lughard, and died in April, 1765

He was twice married, and by his first wife had several children. One daughter, who married an Italian of rant named Cilesia, wrote a tragedy called "Almida, which was acted at Drury Lanc. His second wife was the daughter of a nobleman s steward, which had a considerable fortune, which she took care to retain in her own hands.

His stature was diminutive, but he was regularly formed his app article, till he grew corpulent was agreeable, and he suffered it to want no recommendation that dress could give it. His conversation was elegant and easy. The rest of his character may, without injury to his memory, sink into silence.

As a writer, he cannot be placed in any high class
There is no species of composition in which he was Vol XI AA cannot

eminent. His Dramas had their day, a short day, and are forgotten; his blank verse seems to my ear the echo of Thomson. His "Life of Bacon" is known as it is appended to Bacon's volumes, but is no longer mentioned. His works are such as a writer, bustling in the world, shewing himself in publick, and emerging occasionally from time to time into notice, might keep alive by his personal influence; but which, conveying little information, and giving no great pleasure, must soon give way, as the succession of things produces new topicks of conversation and other modes of amusement.

AKENSIDE

MARK AKENSIDE was born on the ninth of November, 17.21, at Newcastle-upon-Tyne His father Mark was a butcher, of the Presbyterian sect, his mothers name was Mary Lumsden He received the first part of his education at the grammar school of Newcastle, and was afterwards instructed by Mr Wilson, who kept a private academy

At the age of eighteen he was sent to Edinburgh, that he might qualify himself for the office of a dissenting minister, and received some assistance from the fund which the Dissenters employ in educating young men of scanty fortune

But a wider view of the world opened other scenes, and prompted other hopes

he determined to study physick, and repaid that contribution, which, being received for a different purpose, he justly thought it dishonourable to retain

Whether, when he resolved not to be a dissenting minister, he ceased to be a Dissenter, I know not

He

He certainly retained an unnecessary and outrageous zeal for what he called and thought liberty; a zeal which sometimes disguises from the world, and not rarely from the mind which it possesses, an envious desire of plundering wealth or degrading greatness; and of which the immediate tendency is innovation and anarchy, an impetuous eagerness to subvert and confound, with very little care what shall be established

Akenside was one of those poets who have felt very early the motions of genius, and one of those students who have very early stored their memories with sentiments and images. Many of his performances were produced in his youth, and his greatest work, "The Pleasures of Imagination," appeared in 1744. I have heard Dodsley, by whom it was published, relate, that when the copy was offered him, the price demanded for it, which was an hundred and twenty pounds, being such as he was not inclined to give precipitately, he carried the work to Pope, who, having looked into it, advised him not to make a niggardly offer; for "this was no every-"day writer"

In 1741 he went to Leyden, in pursuit of medical knowledge; and three years afterwards (May 16, 1744) became doctor of physick, having, according to the custom of the Dutch Universities, published a thesis or dissertation. The subject which he chose was "The Original and Growth of the Human" Feetus," in which he is said to have departed, with great judgment, from the opinion then established, and to have delivered that which has been since confirmed and received.

Akenside was a young man, warm with every notion that by nature or accident had been connected with the sound of liberty, and, by an eccentricity which such dispositions do not easily avoid, a lover of contradiction, and no friend to any thing established. He adopted Shaftesbury's foolish assertion of the efficacy of ridicule for the discovery of truth. For this he was attacked by Warburton, and defended by Dyson. Warburton afterwards reprinted his remarls at the end of his dedication to the Freethinkers.

The result of all the arguments, which have been produced in a long and eager discussion of this idle question, may easily be collected. If ridicule be applied to any position as the test of truth, it will then become a question whether such ridicule be just, and this can only be decided by the application of truth, as the test of indicule. Two men, feating, one a real and the other a fancied danger, will be for a while equally exposed to the inevitable consequences of cowardice, contemptuous censure, and ludicrous representation, and the true state of both cases must be known, before it can be decided whose terror is rational, and whose is ridiculous who is to be pitted, and who to be despised. Both are for a while equally exposed to laughter, but both are not therefore equally contemptible

In the revisal of his poem, though he died before he had finished it, he omitted the lines which had given occasion to Waiburton's objections

He published, soon after his return from Leyden (1745), his first collection of odes and was impelled by his rage of patriotism to write a very acrimonious epistle to Pulteney, whom he stigmatizes, under the name of Curio, as the betrayer of his country.

Being now to live by his profession, he first commenced physician at Northampton, where Dr. Stonehouse then practised, with such reputation and success, that a stranger was not likely to gain ground upon him. Akenside tried the contest a while; and, having deafened the place with clamours for liberty, removed to Hampstead, where he resided more than two years, and then fixed himself in London, the proper place for a man of accomplishments like his

At London he was known as a poet, but was still to make his way as a physician, and would perhaps have been reduced to great exigences, but that Mr. Dyson, with an ardour of friendship that has not many examples, allowed him three hundred pounds a year. Thus supported, he advanced gradually in medical reputation, but never attained any great extent of practice, or emmence of popularity. A physician in a great city seems to be the mere play-thing of fortune, his degree of reputation is, for the most part, totally casual they that employ him know not his excellence, they that reject him know not his deficience By any acute observer, who had looked on the transactions of the medical world for half a century, a very curious book might be written on the "Fortune of Physicians"

Akenside appears not to have been wanting to his own success he placed himself in view by all the common methods, he became a Fellow of the Royal Society; he obtained a degree at Cambridge, and was admitted into the College of Physicians, he wrote little poetry, but published, from time to time, medical cssays and observations, he became Physician to St Thomas Hospital he read the Gulstonian Lectures in Anatomy, but hegan to give, for the Crouman Lecture, phistory of the revival of Learning, from which he soon desisted and, in conversation, he very cagerly forced lumself into notice by an ambitious ostentation of elegance and literature

His Discourse on the Dysenter, (1764) was considered as a very conspicuous specimen of Latinity, which entitled him to the same height of place among the scholars as he possessed before among the wits, and he might perhaps have risen to a greater elevation of character, but that his studies were ended with his life, by a putrid fever, June 23, 1770, in the forty-ninth year of his age

AKENSIDE is to be considered as a didactick and lyrick poet. His great work is the "Pleasures "of Imagination" a performance which, published as it was, at the age of twenty-three, raised expectations that were not very amply satisfied. It has undoubtedly a just claim to very particular notice, as an example of great felicity of genius, and uncommon amplitude of acquisitions, of a young mind stored with images, and much exercised in combining and comparing them

With

With the philosophical or religious tenets of the author I have nothing to do, my business is with his poetry. The subject is well chosen, as it includes all images that can strike or please, and thus comprises every species of poetical delight. The only difficulty is in the choice of examples and illustrations, and it is not easy in such exuberance of matter to find the middle point between penury and satiety. The parts seem artificially disposed, with sufficient coherence, so as that they cannot change their places without injury to the general design.

His images are displayed with such luxuriance of expression, that they are hidden, like Butler's Moon, by a "Veil of Light," they are forms fantastically lost under superfluity of dress Pars minima est ipsa puella sui. The words are multiplied till the sense is hardly perceived; attention deserts the mind, and settles in the ear. The reader wanders through the gay diffusion, sometimes amazed, and sometimes delighted, but, after many turnings in the flowery labyrinth, comes out as he went in. He remarked little, and laid hold on nothing

To his veisification justice requires that praise should not be denied. In the general fabrication of his lines he is perhaps superior to any other writer of blank verse, his flow is smooth, and his pauses are musical, but the concatenation of his verses is commonly too long continued, and the full close does not recur with sufficient frequency. The sense is carried on through a long intertexture of complicated clauses, and, as nothing is distinguished, nothing is remembered.

The

The exemption which blank verse affords from the necessity of closing the sense with the couplet be-trays luxuriant and active minds into such self indulgence, that they pile image upon image, ornament upon ornament, and are notersily persuaded to close the sense at all. Blank verse will therefore, I fear, be too often found in description existerant, in argument logunous, and in narration tiresome

His diction is certainly poetical as it is not prosaich, and elegant as it is not vulgar. He is to be commended as having fewer artifices of disgust than most of his brethren of the blank song. He rirely either recalls old phrases, or twists his inetre into harsh inversions. The sense however of his words is strained, when "he views the Ganges from Alpine" heights—that is, from mountains like the Alps And the pedant surely intrudes (but when was blank verse without pedantry?), when he tells how "Plamets absolve the stated round of Time

It is generally known to the readers of poetry that he intended to revise and augment this work but died before he had completed his design. The reformed work as he left it, and the additions which he had made, are very properly retained in the late collection. He seems to have somewhat contracted his diffusion but I how not whether he has gained in closeness what he has lost in splendor. In the additional book, the 'Tale of Solon is too long

One great defect of his poem is very properly censured by Mr Walker, unless it may be said, in his defence, that what he has omitted was not properly in his plan. "His picture of man is grand "and beautiful, but unfinished." The immortality

"of the soul, which is the natural consequence of the appetites and powers she is invested with, is scarcely once hinted throughout the poem. This deficiency is amply supplied by the masterly pencil of Dr. Young; who, like a good philosopher, has invincibly proved the immortality of man, from the grandeur of his conceptions, and the meanness and misery of his state, for this reason, a few passages are selected from the 'Night Thoughts,' which, with those from Akenside, seem to form a complete view of the powers, situation, and end of man." Exercises for Improvement in Elocution,' p. 66.

His other poems are now to be considered; but a short consideration will dispatch them. It is not easy to guess why he addicted himself so diligently to lyrick poetry, having neither the ease and airmess of the lighter, nor the vehemence and elevation of the grander ode. When he lays his ill-fated hand upon his harp, his former powers seem to desert him; he has no longer his luxurance of expression, nor variety of images. His thoughts are cold, and his words inelegant. Yet such was his love of lyricks, that, having written with great vigour and poignancy his "Epistle to Curio," he transformed it afterwards into an ode disgraceful only to its author

Of his odes nothing favourable can be said; the sentiments commonly want force, nature, or novelty; the diction is sometimes haish and uncouth, the stanzas ill-constituted and unpleasant, and then hymes dissonant, or unskilfully disposed, too distant from each other, or arranged with too little regard to established use, and therefore perplexing to the ear, which

which in a short composition has not time to grow familiar with an innovation

To examine such compositions singly cannot be required they have doubtless brighter and darker parts but, when they are once found to be generally dull, all further labour may be spared for to what use can the work be criticised that will not be read?

G R A Y.

HOMAS GRAY, the son of Mr Philip Gray, a scrivener of London, was born in Cornhill, November 26, 1716. His grammatical education he received at Eton under the care of Mr Antrobus, his mother's brother, then assistant to Dr George, and when he left school, in 1734, entered a pensioner at Peterhouse in Cambridge.

The transition from the school to the college is, to most young scholars, the time from which they date their years of manhood, liberty, and happiness, but Gray seems to have been very little delighted with academical gratifications; he liked at Cambridge neither the mode of life nor the fashion of study, and lived sullenly on to the time when his attendance on lectures was no longer required. As he intended to profess the Common Law, he took no degree.

When he had been at Cambridge about five years, Mr. Horace Walpole, whose friendship he had gained at Eton, invited him to travel with him as his companion. They wandered through France into Italy; and Gray's Letters contain a very pleasing account of many parts of their journey. But unequal friendships ships are easily dissolved at I lorence they quarrelled, and parted and Mr Walpole is now content to have it told that it was by his fault. If we look, however, without prejudice on the world, we shall find that men, whose consciousness of their own ment sets them above the compliances of servility, are apt enough in their association with superiors to watch their own dignity with troublesome and punetihous jealousy, and in the fervour of independence to exact that attention which they refuse to pay Part'they did, whatever was the quarrel' and the rest of their travels was doubtless more unpleasant to them both. Gray continued his journey in a manner suitable to his own little fortune, with only an occasional servant.

He returned to England in September 1741, and in about two months afterwards buried his father, who had, by an injudicious waste of money upon a new house, so much lessened his fortune, that Gray thought himself too poor to study the law. He therefore retired to Cambridge, where he soon after became Bacheloi of Civil Law, and where, without liking the phase or its inhabitants, or professing to like them, he passed, except a short residence at London, the rest of his life!

About this time he wis deprived of Mr West, the son of a chancellor of Ireland, a friend on whom he appears to have set a high value, and who deserved his esteem by the powers which he shews in his Letters, and in the "Ode to May, which Mr Mason has preserved, as well as by the sincernt with which, when Gray sent him part of "Agription" pina,

"pina," a tragedy that he had just begun, he gave an opinion which probably intercepted the progress of the work, and which the judgment of every reader will confirm. It was certainly no loss to the English stage that "Agrippina" was never finished.

In this year (1742) Gray seems to have applied himself seriously to poetry, for in this year were produced the "Ode to Spring," his "Prospect of "Eton," and his "Ode to Adversity" He began likewise a Latin poem, "De principus cogitandi."

It may be collected from the naaritive of M1. Mason, that his first ambition was to have excelled in Latin poetry perhaps it were reasonable to wish that he had prosecuted his design, for, though there is at present some embarrassment in his phrase, and some harshness in his lyrick numbers, his copiousness of language is such as very few possess; and his lines, even when imperfect, discover a writer whom practice would have made skilful

He now lived on at Peterhouse, very little solicitous what others did or thought, and cultivated his mind and enlarged his views without any other purpose than of improving and amusing himself, when Mr Mason, being elected Fellow of Pembroke Hall, brought him a companion who was afterwards to be his editor, and whose fondness and fidelity has kindled in him a zeal of admiration which cannot be reasonably expected from the neutrality of a stranger, and the coldness of a critick.

In this retirement he wrote (1747) an ode on the Death of Mr. Walpole's Cat," and the year afterwards attempted a poem, of more importance, on

"Govern-

"Government and Education, of which the fragments which remain have many excellent lines

His next production (1750) was his far-firmed "Elegy in the Church-yard, which, finding its way into a Magazine, first, I believe, made him known to the publick

An invitation from lady Cobham about this time gave occasion to an odd composition called "A "Long Story,' which adds little to Gray's character

Several of his pieces were published (1753), with designs hy Mr Bentley and, that they might in some form or other make a book, only one side of each leaf was printed. I believe the poems and the plates recommended each other so well, that the whole impression was soon bought. This year he lost his mother.

Some time afterwards (1756) some young men of the college, whose chambers were near his, diverted themselves with disturbing him by frequent and troublesome noises, and, as is said, by prant s yet more offensive and contemptuous. This insolence, having endured it a while, he represented to the governors of the society, among whom pethaps he had no friends, and, finding his complaint little regarded, removed himself to Pembroke Hall

In 17.57 he published "The Progress of Poetry and "The Bard, two compositions at which the readers of poetry were at first content to gaze in mute amazement. Some that tried them confessed their mability be understand them, though Warburton said that they were understood as well as the works of Milton and Shak-peare, which it is the fashion to admire. Garrick wrote a few lines in their praise. Some hardy champions undertook to rescue them from neglect, and in a short time many were content to be shewn beauties which they could not see.

Gray's reputation was now so high, that, after the death of Cibber, he had the honour of refusing the laurel, which was then bestowed on Mr Whitehead.

His curiosity, not long after, drew him away from Cambridge to a lodging near the Museum, where he resided near three years, reading and transcribing; and, so far as can be discovered, very little affected by two odes on "Oblivion" and "Obscurity," in which his lyrick performances were ridiculed with much contempt and much ingenuity.

When the Professor of Modern History at Cambridge died, he was, as he says, "cockered and "spirited up," till he asked it of lord Bute, who sent him a civil refusal, and the place was given to Mr Brocket, the tutor of Sir James Lowther.

His constitution was weak, and, believing that his health was promoted by exercise and change of place, he undertook (1765) a journey into Scotland, of which his account, so far as it extends, is very curious and elegant. for, as his comprehension was ample, his curiosity extended to all the works of art, all the appearances of nature, and all the monuments of past events. He naturally contracted a friendship with Dr Beattie, whom he found a poet, a philosopher, and a good man. The Mareschal College at Aberdeen offered him the degree of Doctor of Laws, which, having omitted to take it at Cambridge, he thought it decent to refuse.

What he had formerly solicited in vain was at last given him without solicitation. The Professorship of History became again vacunt, and he received (1768) an offer of it from the Duke of Grafton. He accepted, and retained it to his death, always designing lectures, but never reading them, uneasy at his neglect of duty, and appeasing his uneasiness with designs of reformation, and with a resolution which he believed himself to have made of assigning the office, if he found himself unable to discharge it

Ill health made another journey necessary, and he visited (1769) Westmorland and Cumberland He that reads his epistolary narration wishes, that to travel, and to tell his travels, had been more of hi employment but it is by studying at home that we must obtain the ability of travelling with intelligence and improvement

His travels and his studies were now near their end The gout, of which he had sustained many weak attacks, fell upon his stomach, and, yielding to no medicines, produced strong convulsions, which (July 30, 1771,) terminated in death

His character I am willing to adopt, as Mr Mason has done, from a Letter written to my friend Mr Boswell, by the Rev Mr Temple, rector of St Gluvias in Cornwall, and am as willing as his warmest well wisher to believe it true

"Perhaps he was the most learned man in Eu
"tope He was equally acquainted with the ele gant and profound parts of science, and that not su
"perficially, but thoroughly He I new every branch of hi tory both natural and civil had read all the "original historians of England, France, and Italy and was a great antiquarian Criticism, metaphysicks, morals, politicks, made a principal part of his Vol XI Be study

"study, voyages and travels of all sorts were his fa-" vourite amusements, and he had a fine taste in paint-" ing, prints, aichitecture, and gardening. With such " a fund of knowledge, his conversation must have " been equally instructing and entertaining, but he " was also a good man, a man of vutue and huma-"nity. There is no character without some speck, " some imperfection, and I think the greatest defect " in his was an affectation in delicacy, or rather effe-"minacy, and a visible fastidiousness, or contempt " and disdain of his inferiors in science. He also had, " in some degree, that weakness which disgusted Vol-"tane so much in Mr Congreve though he seemed " to value others chiefly according to the progress that "they had made in knowledge, yet he could not bear "to be considered merely as a man of letters, and, " though without birth, or fortune, or station, his de-" sue was to be looked upon as a private independent "gentleman, who read for his amusement Perhaps " it may be said, What signifies so much knowledge, "when it produced so little? Is it worth taking so "much pains to leave no memorials but a few poems? " But let it be considered that Mr Giay was to others " at least innocently employed; to himself certainly "beneficially His time passed agreeably he was " every day making some new acquisition in science; " his mind was enlarged, his heart softened, his vir-"tue strengthened, the world and mankind were " shewn to him without a mask; and he was taught " to consider every thing as trifling, and unworthy " of the attention of a wise man, except the pursuit " of knowledge and practice of viitue, in that state "wherem God hath placed us."

To this character Mi Mason has added a more particular account of Gray's skill in zoology. He has remarked, that Gray's effeminacy was affected most "before those whom he did not wish to please, and that he is unjustly charged with making knowledge his sole reason of pieterence, as he paid his esteem to none whom he did not likewise believe to be good

What has occurred to me from the slight inspection of his Letters in which my undertaking has engaged me is, that his mind had a large grasp, that his curiosity was unlimited, and his judgment cultivated that he was a man likely to love much where he loved at all but that he was fistidious and hard to please. His contempt, however, is often employed, where I hope it will be approved, upon scepticism and infidelity. His short account of Shafteshury I will insert.

'You say you cannot conceive how Lord Shaftesbury came to he a philosopher in vogue I will tell you first, he was a lord secondly, he was
"as vain as any of his readers thirdly, men are "very prone to believe what they do not understand, fourthly, they will believe any thing at all, pro"vided they are under no obligation to believe it, fifthly, they love to take a new road, eigh when
"that road leads no where sixthly, he was reckoned
"a fine writer, and seems always to mean more than "the said Would you have any more reasons? An "interval of above forty years has pretty well de "stroyed the charm A dead lord ranks with commoners vanity is no longer interested in the matter for a new road has become an old one

Mr. Mason has added, from his own knowledge, that, though Gray was poor, he was not eager of money, and that, out of the little that he had, he was very willing to help the necessitous.

As a writer he had this peculiarity, that he did not write his pieces first rudely, and then correct them, but laboured every line as it alose in the train of composition, and he had a notion not very peculiar, that he could not write but at certain times, or at happy moments, a fantastick foppery, to which my kindness for a man of learning and virtue wishes him to have been superior.

GRAY's Poetry is now to be considered; and I hope not to be looked on as an enemy to his name, if I confess that I contemplate it with less pleasure than his life.

His ode "On Spring" has something poetical, both in the language and the thought, but the language is too luxuriant, and the thoughts have nothing new. There has of late arisen a practice of giving to adjectives derived from substantives the termination of participles, such as the cultured plain, the daised bank; but I was sorry to see, in the lines of a scholar like Gray, the homed Spring. The morality is natural, but too stale; the conclusion is pretty.

The poem "On the Cat" was doubtless by its author considered as a trifle, but it is not a happy trifle. In the first stanza, "the azure flowers that "blow" shew resolutely a rhyme is sometimes made when it cannot easily be found. Selima, the Cat, is called a nymph, with some violence both to language and sense, but there is no good use made of it when it is done, for of the two lines,

What female heart can gold despise?
What cat s averse to fish?

the first relates merely to the nymph, and the second only to the eat. The sixth stanza contains a melancholy truth, that "a favourite has no friend," but the last ends in a pointed sentence of no relation to the purpose if ulat glistered liad been gold, the eat would not have gone into the water and, if she had, would not less have been drowned

The "Prospect of Eton College suggests nothing to Gray which every beholder does not equally think and feel. His supplication to father I hames, to tell him who drives the hoop or tosses the ball, is useless and puerile. Father Thimes has no better means of knowing than himself. His epithet "buyom health" is not elegant. he seems not to understand the word Gray thought his language more poetical as it was more remote from common use finding in Dryden "honey redolent of Spring, an expression that reaches the utmost limits of our language, Gray drove it a little more beyond common apprehension, by making 'gales to be "redolent of joy and youth"

Of the "Ode on Adversity, the liint was at first taken from "O Diva, gratum quæ regis Antium but Gray has excelled his original by the variety of his sentiments, and by their moral application. Of this piece, at once poetical and rational, I will not,

by slight objections, violate the dignity

My process has now brought me to the wonder ful "Wonder of Wonders,' the two Sister Odes, by which, which, though either vulgar ignorance or common sense at first universally rejected them, many have been since persuaded to think themselves delighted. I am one of those that are willing to be pleased, and therefore would gladly find the meaning of the first stanza of the "Progress of Poetry"

Gray seems in his impture to confound the images of "spreading sound and running water" A "stream " of musick" may be allowed; but where does "musick," however "smooth and strong," after having visited the "verdant vales, rowl down the " steep amain," so as that " rocks and nodding groves " rebellow to the roar?" If this be said of Musick, it is nonsense; if it be said of Water, it is nothing to the purpose.

The second stanza, exhibiting Mais's car and Jove's eagle, is unworthy of fuither notice. Criticism disdains to chase a school-boy to his common-places.

To the third it may likewise be objected, that it is drawn from mythology, though such as may be more easily assimilated to real life. Idalia's "velvet green" has something of cant. An epithet or metaphor drawn from Nature enobles Art: an epithet or metaphor drawn from Art degrades Nature. Gray is too fond of words arbitrarily compounded. "Many-"twinkling" was formerly censured as not analogical, we may say "many-spotted," but scarcely "many-spotting." This stanza, however, has something pleasing.

Of the second ternary of stanzas, the first endeavours to tell something, and would have told it, had it not been crossed by Hyperion: the second de-seribes well enough the universal prevalence of Poetry, but I am afraid that the conclusion will not arise from the premises. The caverns of the North and the plains of Chila are not the residences of "Glory" and generous Shame. But that Poetry and Virtue go always together is an opinion so pleasing, that I can forgive him who resolves to think it true.

scribeș

The third stranza sounds big with "Delplin, and "Egean, and "Ihssus, and "Meander, and "Ihslowed fountains, and "solumn sound but in all Gray's odes there is a kind of cumbrous splendour which we wish away. His position is at last false in the time of Duite and Petrarch, from whom we derive our first school of Poetry, Italy was over run by "tyrint power and "coward vice nor was our state much better when we first borrowed the Italian arts

Of the third ternary, the first gives a my thological birth of Shakspeare. What is said of that mighty genius is true, but it is not said happily, the real effects of this poetical power are put out of sight by the pomp of machinery. Where truth is sufficient to fill the mind, fiction is worse than useless the countrifeit debases the genuine.

His recount of Milton's blindness, if we suppose it caused by study in the formation of his poem, a supposition surely allowable, is poetically true, and happily imagined. But the car of Dryden, with his tuo coursers, has nothing in it peculiar, it is a car in which any other rider may be placed.

"The Bard appears, at the first view, to be, as Algarotti and others have remarled, an imitation of the prophecy of Nercus Algarotti thinks it superior to its original, and if preference depends only on the imagery and animation of the two poems, his judgment is right. There is in "The Baid" more force, more thought, and more variety. But to copy is less than to invent, and the copy has been unhappily produced at a wrong time. The fiction of Hoiace was to the Romans credible, but its revival disgusts us with apparent and unconquerable falsehood. Incredulus odi.

To select a singular event, and swell it to a giant's bulk by fabulous appendages of spectres and predictions, has little difficulty; for he that forsakes the probable may always find the marvellous. And it has little use, we are affected only as we believe, we are improved only as we find something to be imitated or declined. I do not see that "The Bard" promotes any truth, moral or political

His stanzas are too long, especially his epodes; the ode is finished before the car has learned its measures, and consequently before it can receive pleasure from their consonance and recurrence.

Of the first stanza the abrupt beginning has been celebrated, but technical beauties can give praise only to the inventor. It is in the power of any man to rush abruptly upon his subject, that has read the ballad of Johnny Armstrong,

Is there ever a man in all Scotland

The initial resemblances, or alliterations, "ruthless, helin or hauberk," are below the grandeur of a poem that endeavours at sublimity.

In the second stanza the Bard is well described but in the third we have the puerihties of obsolete mythology. When we are told that "Cadwillo" hush d the stormy main, and that "Modred" "made huge Plinhmion bow his cloud topp d "head, attention recoils from the repetition of a tale that, even when it was first heard, was heard with scorn

The neaving of the numbers sheet he borrowed, as he owns, from the Northern Bards, but their texture, however, was very properly the work of female powers, as the act of spinning the thread of life is another mythology. Theft is always dangerous Gray has made weaters of slaughtered bards by a fiction outrageous and incongruous. They are then called upon to "Weave the warp, and weave the "woof, perhaps with no great propriety for it is by crossing the neaf with the near perhaps with the near perhaps when we have the web of piece and the first line was dearly bought by the admission of its wretched correspondent, "Give ample room and verge enough." He has, however, no other line as bad

The third stanza of the second ternary is commended, I think, beyond its ment. The personffication is indistinct. This st and Hunger are not alike and their features, to make the imagery perfect, should have been discriminated. We are told, in the same stanza, how "towers are fed. But I will no longer look for particular faults, yet let it be observed that the ode might have been concluded with an action of better example, but suicide is always to be had, without expence of thought.

Dryden's Sebastian

^{*} I have a soul that like an ample shield

[&]quot; Can take in all, and serve enough for more

These odes are marked by glittering accumulations of ungraceful ornaments, they strike, rather than please; the images are magnified by affectation, the language is laboured into harshness. The mind of the writer seems to work with unnatural violence. "Double, double, toil and trouble" He has a kind of strutting dignity, and is tall by walking on tiptoe His art and his struggle are too visible, and there is too little appearance of ease and nature".

To say that he has no beauties, would be unjust: a man like him, of great learning and great industry, could not but produce something valuable. When he pleases least, it can only be said that a good design was ill directed.

His translations of Northern and Welsh Poetry deserve praise, the imagery is preserved, perhaps often improved; but the language is unlike the language of other poets.

In the character of his Elegy I rejoice to concur with the common reader, for by the common sense of readers, uncorrupted with literary prejudices, after all the refinements of subtilty and the dogmatism of learning, must be finally decided all claim to poetical honours. The "Church-yard" abounds with images which find a mirrour in every mind, and with sentiments to which every bosom returns an echo. The four stanzas, beginning "Yet even these bones, are to me original. I have never seen the notions in any other place—yet he that reads them here persuades himself that he has always felt them. Had Gray written often thus, it had been vain to blame, and useless to pruse him.

Lord Orford used to assert, that Gray "never wrote any "thing easily, but things of humour," and added, that humour was his natural and original turn C

LYTTELTON.

GEORGE LYTTELTON, the son of Sir Thomas Lyttelton, of Hagley in Worcestershire, was born in 1709. He was educated at Eton, where he was so much distinguished, that his exercises were recommended as models to his schoolfellows.

From Eton he went to Christ-church, where he retained the same reputation of superiority, and displayed his abilities to the publick in a poem on "Blenheim."

He was a very early writer, both in verse and prose. His "Progress of Love," and his "Persian Letters," were both written when he was very young, and indeed the character of a young man is very visible in both. The verses cant of shepherds and flocks, and crooks dressed with flowers, and the Letters have something of that indistinct and headstrong ardour for liberty which a man of genius always catches when he enters the world, and always suffers to cool as he passes forward.

Lyttelton now stood in the first rank of opposition; and Pope, who was incited, it is not easy to say how, to increase the clamour against the ministry, commended him among the other patriots. This drew upon him the reproaches of Fox, who, in the house, imputed to him as a crime his intimacy with a lampooner so unjust and licentious. Lyttelton supported his friend, and replied, that he thought it an homour to be received into the familiarity of so great a poet

While he was thus conspicuous, he marited (1741) Miss Lucy Fortescue of Devonshire, by whom he had a son, the late Lord Lyttelton, and two daughters, and with whom he appears to have lived in the highest degree of connubial felicity, but human pleasures are short, she died in childbed about five years afterwards, and he solaced himself by writing a long poem to her memory.

He did not, however, condemn himself to perpetual solitude and sorrow, for, after a while, he was content to seek happiness again by a second marriage with the daughter of Sir Robert Rich. but the experiment was unsuccessful.

At length, after a long struggle, Walpole 'gave way, and honour and profit were distributed among his conquerors. Lyttelton was made (1744) one of the Lords of the Treasury; and from that time was engaged in supporting the schemes of the ministry.

Politicks did not, however, so much engage him as to withhold his thoughts from things of more importance. He had, in the pride of juvenile confidence, with the help of corrupt conversation, entertained doubts of the truth of Christianity but he thought the time now come when it was no longer fit to doubt or believe by chance, and applied himself seriously to the great question. His studies, being honest, ended in conviction. He found that religion was true, and what he had learned he endeavoured to teach (1747) by "Observations on the "Conversion of St. Paul., a treatise to which infidelity has never been able to fabricate a specious answer. This book his father had the happiness of seeing, and expressed his pleasure in a letter which deserves to be inserted.

tained

"I have read your religious treatise with infinite pleasure and satisfaction. The style is fine and elear, the arguments close, cogent, and irresistible. May the King of kings, whose glorious cause you have so well defended, neward your pious labours, and grant that I may be found worthy, through the merits of Jesus Christ, to be an eye witness of that happiness which I don't doubt he will boun tifully bestow upon you. In the mean time, I shall never cease glorifying God, for having endowed you with such useful talents, and giving me so good a son.

" Your affectionate fither,

"THOMAS LYLLELTON"

A few years afterwards (1751), by the death of his father, he inherited a buonets title with a large estate, which, though perhaps he did not augment, he was careful to adorn by a house of great elegance and expence, and by much attention to the decora-

As he continued his activity in parliament, he was gradually advancing his claim to profit and preferment, and accordingly was made in time (1754) cofferer and privy counsellor: this place he exchanged next year for the great office of chancellor of the Exchequer; an office, however, that required some qualifications which he soon perceived himself to want.

The year after, his curiosity led him into Wales; of which he has given an account perhaps rather with too much affectation of delight, to Archibald Bower, a man of whom he has conceived an opinion more favourable than he seems to have deserved, and whom, having once espoused his interest and fame, he was never persuaded to disown. Bower, whatever was his moral character, did not want abilities, attacked as he was by an universal outcry, and that outcry, as it seems, the echo of truth, he kept his ground: at last, when his defences began to fail him, he sallied out upon his adversaries, and his adversaries retreate.

About this time Lyttelton published his "Dia"logues of the Dead," which were very eagerly read, though the production rather, as it seems, of leisure than of study rather effusions than compositions.
The names of his persons too often enable the reader to anticipate their conversation, and, when they have met, they too often part without any conclusion
He has copied Fenelon more than Fontenelle.

When they were first published, they were kindly commended by the "Critical Reviewers," and poor

Lyttelton,

Lyttelton, with humble gratitude, returned, in a note which I have read, acknowledgements which can never be proper, since they must be paid either for flattery or for justice

When, in the latter part of the last reign, the inauspicious commencement of the war made the dissolution of the ministry unavoidable, Sir George Lyttelton, losing with the rest his employment, was recompensed with a peerige and rested from political turbulence in the House of Lords

His last literary production was his "History of "Henry the Second, elaborated by the searches and deliberations of twenty years, and published with such anxiety as only vanity can dictate

The story of this publication is remarkable. The whole work was printed twice over, a great part of it three times, and many sheets four or five times. The booksellers paid for the first impression, but the charges and repeated operations of the press were at the expence of the author, whose ambitious accuracy is known to have cost him at least a thousand pounds. He began to print in 1755. Three volumes appeared in 1764, a second edition of them in 1767, a third edition in 1768, and the conclusion in 1771.

Andrew Reid, a man not without considerable ablities, and not unacquainted with letters or with life, undertook to persuade Lyttelton, as he had persuaded himself, that he was master of the secret of punctuation, and, as fear begets credulity, he was employ ed, I know not at what price, to point the pages of "Henry the Second The book was at last pointed and printed, and sent into the world Lyttelton took money for his copy, of which when he had paid the Vol. XI C c pointer, he probably gave the rest away; for he was very liberal to the indigent.

When time brought the History to a third edition, Reid was either dead or discarded; and the superintendance of typography and punctuation was committed to a man originally a comb-maker, but then known by the style of Doctor. Something uncommon was probably expected, and something uncommon was at last done; for to the Doctor's edition is appended, what the world had hardly seen before, a list of errors in nineteen pages.

But to politicks and literature there must be an end. Lord Lyttelton had never the appearance of a strong or of a healthy man, he had a slender, uncompacted frame, and a meagre face; he lasted however sixty years, and was then seized with his last illness. Of his death, a very affecting and instructive account has been given by his physician*, which will spare me the task of his moral character.

"On Sunday evening the symptoms of his lord"ship's disorder, which for a week past had alarmed
"us, put on a fatal appearance, and his lordship beleved himself to be a dying man. From this time he suffered by restlessness rather than pain, though his nerves were apparently much fluttered, his mental faculties never seemed stronger, when he was thoroughly awake.

"His lordship's bilious and hepatic complaints seemed alone not equal to the expected mournful event, his long want of sleep, whether the consequence of the irritation in the bowels, or, which is more probable, of causes of a different kind, ac-

^{*} Di. Johnstone of Kidderminster C

" counts for his loss of strength, and for his death, "very sufficiently

"Though his lordship wished his approaching dissolution not to be lingering, he waited for it with resignation. He said, 'It is a folly, a keeping me in misery, now to attempt to prolong life.' yet he was easily persuided, for the satisfaction of others, to do or take any thing thought proper for him. On Saturday he had been remark ably better, and we were not without some hopes of his recovery.

"On Sunday, about eleven in the foremoon, his " lordship sent for me, and said he felt a great hurry, and wished to have a little conversation with me, "in order to divert it He then proceeded to open the fountain of that heart, from whence goodness had so long flowed, as from a copious spring "'Doctor, said he, 'you shall be my confessor " when I first set out in the world, I had friends who "endeavoured to shake my behef in the Christian religion I saw difficulties which staggered me "but I kept my mind open to conviction The evidences and doctrines of Christianity, studied " with attention, made me a most firm and persuaded " believer of the Christian religion I have made it "the rule of my life, and it is the ground of my future hopes I have erred and sinned but have "repented, and never indulged any vicious habit " In politicks, and publick life, I have made publick " good the rule of my conduct I never give coun-"sels which I did not at the time think the best I " have seen that I was sometimes in the wrong but "I did not crr designedly I have endcayoured, in " private cc2

"private life, to do all the good in my power, and "never for a moment could indulge malicious or un-"just designs upon any person whatsoever."

"At another time he said, 'I must leave my soul, "in the same state it was in before this illness; I find this a very inconvenient time for solicitude about any thing'

"On the evening, when the symptoms of death came on, he said, 'I shall die; but it will not be your fault' When loid and lady Valentia came to see his loidship, he gave them his solemn bene-diction, and said, 'Be good, be vii tuous, my loid; you must come to this' Thus he continued giving his dying benediction to all around him. On Monday morning a lucid interval gave some small hopes, but these vanished in the evening; and he continued dying, but with very little uneasiness, till Tuesday morning, August 22, when between seven and eight o'clock, he expired, almost without a groan"

His lordship was buried at Hagley; and the following inscription is cut on the side of his lady's monument.

"This unadorned stone was placed here by the particular desire and express directions of the Right Honourable George Lord Lyttelton, who died August 22, 1773, aged 64."

Lord Lyttelton's Poems are the works of a man of literature and judgment, devoting part of his time to versification. They have nothing to be despised, and little to be admired Of his " Progress of Love, it is sufficient blame to say that it is pastoral His blank verse in "Blenheim lins neither much force nor much elegance His little performances, whether Songs or Epigrims, are sometimes sprightly, and sometimes insipid. His epistolary pieces have a smooth equility, which cannot much tire, because they are short, but which soldom elevates or surprizes But from this censure ought to be excepted his "Advice to Belinds," which, though for the most part written when he was very young, contains much truth and much prudence, very elegantly and vigorously expressed, and shews a mind attentive to life, and a power of poetry which cultivation might have raised to excellence

END OF THE ELEVENTH VOLUME

I rinted by JOHN NICHOLS and SON Ped Li n Passa e Fle t Street, London

